BUSINESS STUDENTS CRUISE TO THE TOP

Rachel Zimmer and Bram Warshafsky won a 2011 Chevrolet Cruze in Canada's Next Top Ad Exec.

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

It started with a bagel lunch and ended with a car.

This was how Rachel Zimmer and Bram Warshafsky met, at a Hillel bagel lunch during their first year at Queen's University.

It may have been the beginning of a beautiful friendship, but more importantly, it was the beginning of a marketing partnership that would eventually win them $1,500, a VIP weekend in Toronto and two brand-new 2011 Chevrolet Cruzes.

"It wasn't planned," Zimmer said of their partnership. "We were coincidentally doing the same things... I think we don't take ourselves seriously. We just have a lot of fun."

Zimmer and Warshafsky are both fourth-year students in Queen's commerce program with a passion for marketing. Together, they've entered and won three marketing contests this past school year.

The first was the Queen's Marketing Association Conference Sunsilk Challenge, sponsored by Unilever. Students in the competition, which was held in Kingston, Ont., in January, had to create a marketing campaign for Sunsilk shampoo. Zimmer and Warshafsky proposed a $5-million marketing campaign that would include using Shakira, a singer who works with Unilever in Latin America, to endorse the product.

Their prize included a meeting with Unilever's CEO.

The duo also entered the Commerce Society's business-plan competition at Queen's, for which they had to come up with an idea for a business. Zimmer and Warshafsky proposed an online business that would help students with their resumés. The two placed first and won $1,500.

But the pièce de résistance was Zimmer and Warshafsky's latest victory. Recently they entered Canada's Next Top Ad Exec, sponsored by Chevrolet. The national competition attracted 196 teams from 28 business schools throughout Canada, and asked students to create a non-traditional marketing campaign that used elements of social media and event marketing. The campaign would launch the new Chevrolet Cruze, which comes out this fall. The competition, with a hypothetical marketing budget of $500,000, included a quick initial pitch, a written report and a final 25-minute pitch.

While Zimmer and Warshafsky, who tied for first place last month with Mark Scattolon, a student at McMaster University, signed a confidentiality agreement and can't discuss the details of their proposed campaign, Zimmer and Warshafsky said that it used Facebook and Twitter and included an event.

Warshafsky added that the two also filmed a video for the judges to get their point across.

"It was a lot of hard work," he said, adding that he doesn't know how long he spent working on the marketing plan.

"Oh God, I have no idea. I lost track after the first sleepless night."

For the business student, the competition was a chance to apply the skills he learned at Queen's.

"I believe it's important to contextualize academia with real industry learning," he said.

Mikhael Metauro, the co-chair of Canada's Next Top Ad Exec, agrees.

"It provides students with that opportunity to finally apply what they're learning in the classroom," he said. "In class, you don't get those real-life rewards."

Like many involved in the competition, Metauro was impressed with Warshafsky and Zimmer.

"I've heard they're a powerful force," he said. "They definitely have a bright future ahead of them."

Apart from winning a brand-new Chevrolet Cruze each, General Motors may apply some of the concepts from the duo's marketing plan to their new campaign for the 2011 Cruze.

For Warshafsky, both prizes are exciting.

Bram Warshafsky and Rachel Zimmer, Queen's University commerce students, have been working with each other since their first year at Queen's.

"I found out I had that internal passion for cars. There's this universal aspiration to own your own car," he said. "They handed us the keys on stage, it was pretty surreal. I didn't really know what was going on."

The two students have created a solid partnership together. Coincidentally, they'll both be working for Johnson and Johnson's as assistant brand managers once they've graduated.

"Both of us are idea generators," Zimmer said. "I focus on numbers and writing, and Bram does writing and the Photoshop work and creative design."

Warshafsky agrees.

"We've been working together for a while. There's an element of trust. If she says an idea I have isn't good, I'm not going to take it offensively because I respect her opinion. We just gel," he said.

When Warshafsky first applied to Queen's, he enrolled in the biology program.

"Queen's was the only program I applied to... I was set on biology. I got in and thought I'd just give it a shot," he said. "Then I found a passion for marketing. It's kind of weird, but I think a lot of the same principles that are true in sciences are true for business. Adapting a niche for supply and demand, you can be talking about evolution or economics."

For Zimmer, going into business school was a natural decision.

"It was instinctive," she said, adding that, in high school, she was involved in DECA Ontario, a business organization for students.

"[Business] is the best guess at what I want to do. I enjoy business. I love thinking creatively and outside the box."

Art college president is a born teacher

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Sara Diamond can be called an artist and a historian. But she has always been an educator.

She's known this since she was 12.

"I think I knew I wanted to be an educator early on. Very early on. I guess because I was such an active learner as a young person," she said. "It just seemed somehow natural to want to make education more effective."

At 56, that's exactly what she's doing. For the past five years, Diamond has been the president of the Ontario College of Art and Design (OCAD). It was a natural fit after she founded and ran the Banff New Media Institute in 1995, a research and development facility at the Banff Centre, an arts, cultural and educational institute in Alberta.

"It began as a set of workshops and over the years grew to be a really significant institute," she said of the new-media centre. "I built a number of major laboratories there... we had a great number of partners from the commercial world, so it really was a very exciting period of my life."

For her part, Diamond received an extensive education herself. She has a degree in communications and history, a degree in new-media theory and practice and a PhD in computer science.

Diamond, who was born in New York and moved to Toronto as a child, attributes her love of education to her childhood.

"I had, partly through the good tutelage of my family and life experience... good exposure to really effective ways of learning. I equally had exposure to learning situations that maybe didn't challenge me," said Diamond, who spent her high school years at SEED, an alternative public school in Toronto.

"In the '60s, it was a time where there was a lot of attention paid to the individual experience, change and also social engagement," she said. "It was partly the world I was living in that somehow made education more attractive... it convinced me [education] is something to care about."

Like teaching, Diamond's appreciation for art also stemmed from her childhood. While this appreciation eventually led to her first teaching job and later to the National Gallery of Canada, which owns more than a dozen of her video works, it started as a mere hobby.

"There was a creative thread always in my life as a child," she said. "I never took art classes outside of school, but I was always actively engaged... in those classes."

As a teenager, Diamond was involved in theatre, music and dance.

"As I grew older, I was more interested in history and, as an academic, in becoming a historian, but I always had this strong interest and connection with various theatrical movements."

This transferred to an interest in film, which led to the Video In, a film centre in Vancouver. Diamond started a set of classes for people in the art community interested in film there.

"[Film] wasn't being taught as an art format... Before I knew it, the courses were really popular," she said.

That eventually led to a position at the Emily Carr Institute of Art and Design.

"I kind of fell into it and I just loved it. I loved teaching. To this day, I think there's nothing so important as that engagement that teachers can have with students."

The connection between teacher and student shapes Diamond's teaching style. It still does.

"There's an art to teaching, I think. It was something I really focused on trying to learn," she said.

"I loved that kind of engagement with students and to this day, the excitement you have when you see someone learning, it's one of the greatest things in the world."

As president of a large educational institution, Diamond can get a little busy. Her days are filled with speaking engagements, conferences and administrative work. But they're also filled with students.

"I try and have presence in the school," she said. "I'm one of the only, if not the only, president I know who has office hours."

She invites groups of students to her house for dinner, the Dining with Diamond program.

"We have an opportunity to have dinner together and get a sense of what it is in their lives that makes them who they are. I tend to invite students who are mentors and who are in need," she said.

Everything in Diamond's life seems to lead back to OCAD. Even reconstructive surgery.

On a recent trip to Argentina, a train she was travelling on burst into flames, forcing a quick evacuation.

"There was a weird power surge... it was like being in a bad action film," she said. Diamond and the other passengers were forced to jump off the train. She broke her foot and required surgery.

"It gave me a great perspective on something I really care about, which is accessibility and making sure OCAD is inclusive for people who are physically challenged as well as mentally challenged."

Based on Diamond's link to OCAD, and many other educational institutions, the educator understands what makes a good teacher.

"It's a certain charismatic quality. I don't mean that in a cultish way," she said. "[I mean] someone whose personality and own love of the subject comes through in what they teach."

And Diamond would know. She's done it long enough.

Musician's fateful encounter with a blind violinist

By JORDANA DIVON
Special to The CJN

As far as arguments for the existence of fate go, this one is pretty convincing.

It is Ramat Gan, Israel, in the late 1950s. Moshe and Simcha Dalal, recently arrived from Baghdad, take their three-year-old son, Yair, along to a neighbourhood party. Iraqi parties are often filled with music and celebratory spirit, and this one is no exception.

The wide-eyed boy stares in wonder at the scene unfolding around him: three musicians command the room, vigorously playing traditional Iraqi songs. People dance and sing along; laughter mingles with the scent of pita and fried eggplant.

The boy's eyes lock on the violin player, a well-known Jewish-Iraqi musician named Daoud al-Kuwaity. He is mesmerized.

"Daoud was blind, and Daoud used to smoke, and he used to smoke while he played," Yair Dalal, now a prolific Israeli ethnic musician, recalls. ""The cigarette was in his mouth, and the ash was falling on his violin… He was blind, so he didn't see."

At that moment, the three-year-old makes an important life decision. "I think his figure, and the way he looked, and the sound that came out of his violin really did something to me," Dalal, who was in Toronto last month performing with Juno Award-nominated Jaffa Road, says.

For the next three years, the boy pesters his father to let him play violin. At six, Dalal begins studying classical violin at a nearby conservatory, where he remains until he is called to the army.

When his service ends, the young man goes to work at a nature reserve. It is at that time he decides to break from the classical European tradition and seek out the Middle Eastern music of his parents' roots.

That's how Dalal meets Yosef, master of the oud – a twangy pear-shaped string instrument common to the Middle East. Then the strange coincidences begin.

"I came into his house one day, and what do I see?" says Dalal. "I see a photo of Daoud [al-Kuwaity] playing the violin with a cigarette in his mouth and the ashes falling down – exactly as I remember seeing him at three years old."

Shocked, Dalal asks his new friend about the man in the picture. He learns that al-Kuwaity and Yosef had played together for 40 years, and that al-Kuwaity had died recently. Dalal then begins to learn the oud.

Around the same time, Dalal moves to a kibbutz and strikes up a friendship with Ariyeh, a boy who comes to check on the milking cows.

They quickly bond over their mutual love of music. Dalal continues to study oud with Yosef, commanding the instrument as he had the violin.

A few years later, Dalal decides to mount a tribute concert in honour of al-Kuwaity's music: he will play violin and Yosef will play the oud. The concert is a rousing success. After the show, Dalal is surprised when his friend Ariyeh rushes to the stage, grabs his hands, and starts to bless him.

"I said, 'Ariyeh, what are you doing at this concert? What do you have to do with Iraqi music?'"

"You didn't know?" his friend replies. "Daoud was my father."

Dalal stared at his friend, speechless. He continues. "Yair, I hated his music, I didn't like his behaviour, I didn't like his late-night concerts. But now you changed my attitude. I'm going home and gathering all his cassettes. I want to make a collection of my father's music."

Yair Dalal, right, with Jaffa Road

Dalal helps Ariyeh organize his father's music. In time, Dalal would go on to record and archive traditional Bedouin and Babylonian folk songs as part of his celebrated cultural roots projects and to become one of the most prolific ethnic musicians Israel has ever produced. But for now, he remains entrenched in the world of his childhood idol.

Two months zip by and Ariyeh calls his friend over. "I want to give you something," he says. Ariyeh slips into his room and returns with a battered violin case. "Here," he says, handing it to Dalal. "I want you to have this."

The musician opens the case and sets his eyes on a violin filled with ashes from a thousand cigarettes. Al-Kuwaity's violin. "I was thinking, should I clean it up? And then I said, 'No, if I clean it up it will never be Daoud's violin. So I left it."

Yair Dalal playing the oud, a twangy pear-shaped string instrument, common to Middle Eastern music.

The violin is heavily damaged and Dalal is unable to play the instrument, but he picks up the bow and holds it in his calloused hands. And it is with al-Kuwaity's bow that Dalal played to a jam-packed house at Hugh's Room in Toronto's west end on April 25 with Jaffa Road.

The show, Musical Melding, did just that, weaving between Dalal's repertoire of traditional Arabic and Hebrew songs and Jaffa Road's earthy world music blends. Vocalist Aviva Chernick handled Dalal's moody, complex vocal riffs with fluid ease, and Dalal added a palpable energy to the band's award-winning songs.

Sponsored by the Koffler Centre and the New Israel Fund, the concert was an opportunity to witness a pairing of musical kindred spirits, and to experience the quiet magnetism of Dalal's artistry as he handled the violin bow that set him on his path.

Still don't believe in fate?

Lauren Lipson co-stars in a play about love

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Lauren Lipson, a local actor with numerous TV and film credits, is co-starring in the first Toronto production of the critically acclaimed off-Broadway romantic comedy, Almost, Maine.

Directed by Jennifer Copping, the inaugural offering of Little Tiny Things Productions, runs at the Tarragon Theatre's Extra Space until May 15.

An ensemble piece by John Cariani, the play takes place in the remote, mythical town of Almost in Maine. Lipson said the play is about love and all that love encompasses. Almost, Maine consists of three vignettes that follow different sets of characters. "It's all about the shades of love and the different stages of love and the joy, the pain, the confusion, the frustration and the loneliness and all the things that happen when you let yourself fall in love with someone," she said.

Lipson plays Ginette in the vignette "Prologue," Hope in "Hope's Story" and Gayle in "Getting It Back."

"In 'Hope's Story,' Hope goes back to Almost, Maine, to recapture her youth and the love she once had, only to find out that man she has come back for, isn't the man she sees at the door," Lipson said.

"In 'Getting It Back,' I have been with my boyfriend for 11 years and I'm waiting for the ring, and it has not happened yet. I come with 'bags of love' representing all the years we've been together… and I am returning them all," she added.

Lauren Lipson

Lipson, along with Copping and actor Kate Spurgeon, founded Little Tiny Things Productions. They said the theatre company is dedicated to the power of truth in storytelling, with their mission being to serve the story, honour the characters and celebrate human connectedness.

Lipson wants audiences to come away from seeing Almost, Maine with a feeling of renewal and a feeling of strength in love and the belief in love, and that it's OK to love. She said love is a journey and not always a bowl of cherries, but that love is a part of life if you let it happen.

Lipson, the lone actor in her family, is a graduate of the Acting Conservatory at York University. Her acting credits include the television shows The Rick Mercer Report, Little Mosque on the Prairie, The Line and Beautiful People, and three animation series, 6Teen, Total Drama Island and Stoked. Lipson also starred in the short film Gorgeous.

Besides acting, Lipson is a writer. She co-wrote and starred in the 48-hour Toronto Film Challenge award-winning short, AD/BC, and the award-winning short film, The Exquisite Corpses. Her first screenplay, Swirly Girl, is currently in development.

When she's not working, Lipson, who is single, enjoys jogging, yoga and reading.

Senesh documentary out on DVD

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

If you missed the documentary Blessed Is the Match on TV last month – the PBS screening date we published was incorrect for Toronto-area viewers – fear not. The DVD of the film is now in stores.

Blessed Is the Match is an extraordinary and inspiring documentary about Hannah Senesh, the 22-year-old Hungarian-Jewish resistance fighter who parachuted into Nazi-occupied Europe to try to save Hungarian Jews.

Through interviews, eyewitness accounts, rare family photographs, dramatic re-enactments and the writings of her mother, Catherine, the documentary brings Senesh's moving story to life.

The DVD includes around five minutes of deleted scenes, a photo gallery and the trailer.

Theatre company presents new works at Miles Nadal

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Toronto-born actors David Eisner and Avery Saltzman, the co-artistic directors of the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, have lived and breathed theatre since they met at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute more than 30 years ago.

Harold Green Jewish Theatre is a professional non-profit company that produces plays that reflect the Jewish experience.

"Our mandate is to celebrate and embrace Jewish stories, 5,000 years in the making, our triumphs and struggles. David and I feel it is our honour and privilege to do so," says Saltzman.

The company's 2010-11 season, their fourth, will feature Lenin's Embalmers, a co-production with Winnipeg Jewish Theatre by Vern Thiessen and directed by Geoffrey Brumlick; Zero Hour, written and starring Jim Brochu and directed by Piper Laurie; and To Life, directed and conceived by Tim French and Saltzman.

"We had a great past season, and this season looks very exciting for us," Saltzman says, noting that subscription sales are reflecting that. "It has been great and met every expectation. People appreciate the gift we are providing to the city by telling our stories, Jewish stories. We are getting towards good sustainability, but we are always looking for support… people to donate or buy subscriptions."

Saltzman says they want to provide great theatre and to tell great stories for every generation and every ethnicity. He takes pride in producing plays that teach students, Jews and non-Jews alike, about Jewish history, including the Holocaust, as they did with the play Transport.

"We want to tell about our past, but we also want to tell new stories that are coming up – that is why we developed the In The Beginning Festival at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, May 10 to 13," Saltzman says. "We asked for submissions from emerging young Jewish playwrights from across Canada, and we got close to 70 scripts and we chose four. It is amazing how many young Jewish theatre writers want to tell their story through a Jewish perspective."

The company has garnered praise for their efforts from both their Jewish and non-Jewish audiences for their array of theatrical offerings, including the controversial and challenging play Talk, about the Mideast situation. Each performance ended with a well-respected guest speaker, including Martin Luther King III. Saltzman and Eisner also brought in Theodore Bikel, a legendary thespian who delighted audiences in Sholom Aleichem: Laughter Through Tears.

Also on tap for next season is the Conversations on the Green series, at the Jane Mallett Theatre. The program is co-sponsored by the Centre for Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto.

"[Broadcaster] Ralph Benmurgui hosts one-on-one conversations with people in the community who are Jewish and how their roots affected where they are today. For the audience, it is like being a fly on the wall, and don't we all like to be that hearing these personal stories," says Saltzman.

This year's guests are singer-songwriter Amy Sky, lawyer Edward Greenspan, theatre impresario David Mirvish and the host of Fashion Television, Jeanne Beker.

Harold Green Jewish Theatre hopes to one day have its own home theatre. Saltzman is also hoping to form an acting company of Jewish kids with outreach to great directors and actors by next year. For more information about Harold Green Jewish Theatre, visit www.hgjewishtheatre.com.

Capitalism a source of pride and prejudice for Jews

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Capitalism, as American historian Jerry Z. Muller succinctly observes, has been both a blessing and a curse for Jews.

In his superb book, Capitalism and the Jews (Princeton University Press), Muller, a historian at the Catholic University of America, places this complex issue in its proper perspective.

On the one hand, Jews who mastered the intricacies of capitalism enjoyed its fruits. Yet there was a price to pay for this success. Jewish economic prowess emboldened anti-Semites, leading them to condemn capitalism as a form of Jewish domination and exploitation.

Muller, in this erudite volume, traces the relationship between Jews and capitalism and the anti-Semitic backlash it sometimes engendered in free market and Communist societies.

Although Jews were not a "merchant people" for much of their history, they became one in medieval Europe, thanks in part to Christianity's negative attitude to commerce.

Before the rise of modern capitalism in the 17th century, Jews were rank outsiders, falling outside the feudal order of serfs, landowning gentry, merchants and artisans in exclusive guilds.

Since they were forbidden to join guilds, Jews gravitated toward trade and were middlemen between producers and consumers. As well, Jews were involved in the lending of money, known as usury.

The integral role they played in capitalism, he points out, made them "a lightning rod" for the drastic changes it ushered in. Capitalism, in its purest form, brought about "creative destruction," as the economist Joseph Schumpeter noted in a perceptive essay. Capitalism irretrievably displaced older forms of production, consumption and styles of life. After capitalism, the world was never the same again. Those who could not adapt invariably blamed Jews for their misfortunes.

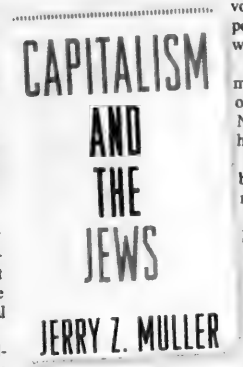
Yet not all Jews were enamoured of capitalism. From the mid-19th century onward, a minority of Jews embraced its polar opposite, communism, thus enabling anti-Semites to pour scorn on Jewish capitalists and Communists.

In the European mind, Muller writes, Jews and capitalism were inextricably linked because Jews were permitted by the church to engage in the stigmatized activity of lending money at interest.

Usury, expressly forbidden as sinful by the Catholic church in 1139, triggered anti-Semitism among the common people. But since money lending was a lubricant in the development of national economies, political authorities protected and tolerated Jews.

The linkage between Jews and capitalism, however, was not always cast in dim colours. The important Austrian economist Freidrich Hayek was of the view that the talents of Jewish entrepreneurs were vital to economic progress. Yet he, too, understood that anti-capitalism bred anti-Semitism.

During the 19th century, Jewish bankers loomed large in European capitalism. The Rothschilds, with branches in Frankfurt, London, Paris, Vienna and Naples, financed peacetime projects and wars. And bankers such as the Bleichroders in Berlin and the Oppenheims in Cologne were instrumental in mobilizing funds for for economic development.



By Muller's estimate, about half the Jewish working population in Germany on the eve of World War I was involved in commerce, trade and finance. The percentage in the Austro-Hungarian Empire was similar.

Not surprisingly, he adds, Jewish economists have won a disproportionate number of Nobel prizes. Since the inception of the Nobel Prize for economics in 1970, Jews have been the recipients 22 times.

Muller's comments on Israel reflect his belief that Jews are particularly adept at managing capitalistic economies.

As he puts it, "By the 1990s, [Israel] had become a centre of entrepreneurial energy, with thousands of startups, and more [Israeli] companies traded on the major New York exchanges than any other country aside from the United States and Canada.

"Thus, in Israel, too, Jews have once again become a highly commercial nation, finding their historical proclivities well suited to the global economy. Indeed, Israelis created their own Diaspora, forming new transnational social networks that recapitulated the experiences of earlier Jewish Diasporas."

Although Jews have been identified with capitalism, they have also been associated with its flip side, communism.

Inevitably, anti-Semitism often pushed Jews to become socialists and Communists. The link is clear. Socialism and communism promised to abolish anti-Semitism by eliminating its partial roots in capitalism.

Elaborating on this theme, Muller says, "The universalism of Marxism, its promise to end all distinctions based upon ethnic or religious origin, was almost irresistible to some young Jews."

As he hastens to add, the identification of Jews with radical political ideologies and movements served to bolster anti-Semitism. "The result was a dialectic of disaster," he writes.

The myth of the Jew as Bolshevik emerged after World War I and became central to Nazism and prompted European collaborators to participate in the Holocaust.

"After the war, the dialectic of anti-Semitism and Jewish involvement in communism continued to influence… eastern Europe, as the conspicuous role played by men and women of Jewish origin in the Sovietization of eastern Europe once again transformed anti-Semitism, this time into an adjunct of popular opposition to Stalinism. And then, in a final twist, the Soviets and the Communists of eastern Europe endeavoured to use this new anti-Semitism for their own ends."

In reality, the vast majority of Jews in Russia considered communism with distaste. Its atheism contradicted Judaism, while its economic policy threatened Jewish merchants, traders and shopkeepers.

But it is undeniably true that in the early Soviet Union and in post-1945 Hungary and Poland, for example, Communists with Jewish backgrounds were appointed to leadership positions before being purged in anti-Semitic show trials and campaigns.

In Capitalism and the Jews, a stellar work of intellectual history, Muller draws on his vast knowledge and synthesizing powers to make the case that capitalism has been a source of pride and prejudice for Jews.

Thus it was hundreds of years ago, and thus it will be hundreds of years from now.

JobKatif helps Gaza evacuees

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

When 28-year-old Yoni Chaim (not his real name) was removed from his home in Neve Dekalim, Gaza, in August 2005 along with his parents and his five siblings, he suffered a serious personal crisis.

Like many people from the Gush Katif bloc of settlements, his entire life was dismantled before his eyes: his house was bulldozed by the Israel Defence Forces; his school and synagogue were destroyed, and his father was forced to abandon his organic vegetable greenhouses, and without his income, the family was suddenly below the poverty line

In short, his entire community – every place he knew and loved – was gone.

He and his family found themselves in a crowded Jerusalem hotel room, where they stayed for more than seven months while he was bounced from school to school. By the time the family moved into a temporary mobile home in Nitsan, the biggest trailer park for Gaza evacuees, Chaim had dropped out of school, wasn't working and refused to get out of bed in the morning. His parents suspected he was taking drugs.

Then, one day, a counsellor appeared at his home from the Jerusalem-based non-profit organization JobKatif. It took a few meetings, but eventually she learned that Chaim was interested in becoming a bus driver. In a matter of days, he was enrolled in a certification program. After passing his exam, the counsellor helped him land the one opening available to new drivers. And since the job was quite far away, she arranged a loan for him to buy a second-hand car.

Today, Chaim is a different person. He goes to work every day and pays back his car loan diligently every month. And he's happy to say he recently started dating someone.

Chaim is one of 1,500 people from Gaza and northern Samaria in the West Bank that JobKatif has helped get back on their feet since the organization was founded in March 2006.

Immediately after the Gaza pullout in the summer of 2005, and even before the temporary trailer parks for the evicted were ready, Rabbi Tzvi Rimon, rabbi of the Alon Shevut community of Gush Etzion in the West Bank, mobilized his community and began reaching out to the evacuees who had been put up temporarily in Jerusalem hotels. They helped them with basic needs, from food and laundry to children's programs.

As time moved on and the evacuees' temporary situation dragged on for months and became more dire, he decided to tackle employment. He went from government office to government office to see who was dealing with the issue, and he quickly discovered that no one was.

Guided by a Jewish tenet that if you see someone in need and no one is helping them, the onus is on you to help, Rabbi Rimon started to search for jobs for the evacuees, and JobKatif was born.

It was Rabbi Rimon's motivating philosophy that appealed most to Judy Lowy, executive director of JobKatif, who joined the organization two years ago.

"I also appreciated the organization's holistic approach to helping," says Lowy, an employment professional with more than 10 years experience. "If someone is beset by personal problems, it is very difficult for them to find a job. These people required a unique approach."

The evacuees from Gaza and northern Samaria underwent extraordinary emotional and psychological trauma, she says. They stood by as the houses they'd built with their own hands were bulldozed by the IDF. They watched their hothouses – the pride of their communities – get torn down by the Palestinians to whom they were left, and they saw their synagogues desecrated and their cemetery torn apart and their dead reburied. They lost everything: their houses, their communities and their livelihoods.

Five years later, their lives are still asunder. Eighty-five per cent of those who moved into the temporary trailer parks are still living there (only 20 per cent of evacuees chose not to move into these parks). It's only in the last six months that the Israeli government has started to make good on its promise to build them new communities inside the Green Line. But by the time construction is finished, many won't be able to afford the new houses, having spent the last five years frittering away their house grants while out of work.

Preliminary results of a census being conducted jointly by JobKatif and the Tnufah Authority, the government agency established to handle the Gaza pullout and its aftermath, indicate that most former residents of Gaza didn't believe the withdrawal would happen and are still in denial. Many are still extremely angry and feel betrayed by the state. The population shows higher incidences of health problems, divorce and teen drug use than the national averages.

Their unemployment rate has also soared, jumping from two to three per cent before the pullout to 21 per cent (the national average is eight per cent). With some 70 per cent of the population having been employed in agriculture or other private businesses, the population's employability outside Gaza has been a major problem, since many farmers are too old and lack the physical strength to rebuild their farms.

"We have the most trouble helping the people who worked in agriculture. They were the hardest hit," Lowy says. "If you spend years building a business, especially if it involves growing something alive, and it is destroyed, it is extremely emotionally destructive."

Another challenge has been finding work for people who ran their own businesses – such as stores, repair and service shops – that are now gone. Many others worked in positions – in daycares, schools, and regional councils – without certification, and despite years of experience, are very hard to employ inside Israel.

Altogether, the evacuees present a unique employment challenge, so JobKatif has come up with a special, one-to-one approach to helping them.

Ariel Porat was able to re-launch his agriculture company in new greenhouses with the assistance from JobKatif.

"These people don't just need job opportunities," says Lowy. "They need motivating, empowering and boosting."

The process starts with outreach. Rather than waiting for individuals to take the initiative, JobKatif sends employment counselors, all specially trained former Gaza residents, to each family with a known need for work. In paying a visit to their home, a counsellor can assess the family's entire situation and determine if there's a larger need there – such as for a social worker or psychologist – and can refer a specialist to the family.

The objective of the first meetings is to get the individual to a point where he or she is ready to get back to work. It's a process that can take from one meeting to 10 or more, Lowy says. Once the person gets there, the counselor starts helping them to review job postings, arrange interviews, prepare their resume and learn interview skills.

For the many people who aren't yet prepared to jump in with both feet, JobKatif has a volunteer program that helps people just get out of bed in the morning and on track to get back to work.

Lowy estimates there are still some 1,000 families in need of employment assistance.

"As time goes by, the nature of our work gets harder," she says. "People who haven't been working for five years at this point are really in a bad way, both financially and emotionally. It gets harder and harder to find these people jobs."

Daring young man flies with the greatest of ease

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Spring is finally in full bloom, with flowers poking their heads through the soil, trees blossoming, cyclists on their bikes and golfers working out the kinks, but for Marlon Bass, this summer will include a quest for snow.

And not just any snow. It's got to be sculpted and groomed and cared for so that freestyle skiers like himself will feel comfortable doing the kind of nerve-wracking tricks and jumps that leaves spectators gasping.

Bass, a Grade 9 student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, will join fellow skiers from the Ontario Junior Ski team at Whistler, B.C., later this summer to prepare for next winter's competitive freestyle season.

Bass will work on the "tricks" of his trade, such as the "900" – two-and-a-half rotations in the air (900 degrees) – and a "switch 720," in which a skier enters a jump backwards and does two-and-a-half rotations in the air.

This clearly is not the relatively gentle downhill skiing that includes slaloming between gates or even hurtling quickly to the bottom in a downhill race. It's the kind that makes his mom shut her eyes when he's spinning in the air.

Freestylers are the skiers who perform death and injury-defying spins and twists in the air and, as winter sports go, are first cousins to the snowboarders who wowed spectators at last winter's Vancouver Olympics.

Marlon Bass

Bass' disciplines are not yet Olympic sports, though they might be by the time he's old enough to qualify for the Canadian team. At this point, striving for that sort of elite competition is not what motivates him. Freestyle skiing, which "is growing a lot in the last couple of years, more than racing has" is just plain fun.

"I like the extremeness, the air," he said. "I like it a lot."

Bass got his start on skis at a relatively young age. He was three or four when he was first introduced to the sport, but it came naturally to him as his family members were all avid skiers at Georgian Peaks, near Collingwood, Ont.

"I really liked it from the start. My parents and brothers liked it. I never got into hockey, so that's what I did in the winter months."

Three or four years ago he heard about freestyle skiing. "I tried it. I liked it."

"It was a big adjustment," he continued. "It took a while to get over the fear of big air [great heights] and knowing how to land a jump without falling.

"I still fall all the time," Bass, 14, acknowledges, but he's suffered no injuries so far.

To excel in freestyle events, "you need to be determined, have good leg strength, and if you fall, you have to get right back up again. If you get hurt, you have to get up and try again," he said.

Bass competes in the half pipe and big air events. The former is completed in a barrel-shaped course flanked by two high walls. The skiers go wall to wall, gather speed, fly into the air and do multiple tricks during a single run.

Big air tricks are completed on a single run off a ramp that permits skiers to gain elevation quickly.

Last winter in Truro, N.S., he was part of the Ontario team that competed in the 2010 Junior National Freestyle Championships. Bass earned two bronze medals, and others on the team did even better. The year before, he finished first at the Rail Comp at Earl Bales and first at Slopestyle Devil's Glen events. The high finishes built a point total that earned him a spot on the provincial team.

Fichman wins big at Fed Cup

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

Sharon Fichman of Toronto helped Canada sweep Argentina 5-0 at the recent Fed Cup World Group Two playoff held on the indoor hard courts of Montreal's Jarry Park Tennis Centre by dominating her doubles match in the final event of the Fed Cup tie.

Fichman teamed with Marie-Eve Pelletier April 25 to defeat Jorgelina Cravero and Aranza Salut 6-4, 6-2 and make the one-sided event joyful for the home crowd.

Fichman was impressive, not losing serve, and breaking the Argentine team with strong net play and backhand shots.

One of Fichman's many highlights in the match was her volley at the net at break point in game three of the second set to give Canada a 3-0 lead, followed by winning the next five points on her serve.

"I was very pleased and feel confident that I will have more success to come this year. We [Canada] jelled as a team, fought for every point, and had everything go as planned," said a jubilant Fichman after her match, which ended with a victory lap around the Tennis Centre with her teammates.

"Sharon knew her role would be in doubles when selected and did all and more than was expected of her this year," said Canadian Fed Cup captain Sylvain Bruneau.

Bruneau selected Fichman to play both singles and doubles for Canada in February at the regulation zone tie in Paraguay, and she came through with two singles and a doubles victory in her three matches.

Fichman, whose aim in 2010 is to be ranked among the top 100 in women's tennis, seems to be well on her way to her goal with a current high of 134.

She had her best tournament in late February in Acapulco, upsetting the number-40 ranked player, Soroma Cirstea of Romania, 6-2, 6-0 and fourth seed Mariya Koryttseva of Ukraine 6-2, 6-3 en route to a quarter-final finish.

Fichman won Tennis Canada's Ace award as Canada's most improved player in 2009. With her high ranking, Fichman will be allowed to enter the qualifying rounds of the major tournaments on the women's pro circuit.

She is an impressive 14-1 in Fed Cup play, being the youngest Canadian ever, at age 14, to earn a spot on the Canadian national team in 2005. At 19, Fichman is still the youngest player on the Canadian Fed Cup and is the first Jewish player selected to play Fed Cup for Canada since Vicki Berner played from 1964 to 1967.

My furry new friend

"Mommy?" says my daughter as she rubs my shoulders in a strange way. "Mommy, do you love me?" she asks in a sweet voice.

I can smell danger. "Well?" she asks again, this time impatiently.

That's my sign – the impatient attitude. It won't be long until she requests the impossible – such as, let's adopt a cat!

"We're not having a cat," I say laconically, anticipating the question.

She seems insulted. "I wasn't gonna ask you about that. Why are you so suspicious?" she replies, adding sulkily "Why not? We want a cat!"

I feel a sneeze coming on.

"Because, tragically, Mommy's allergic to cats, and you know that very well," I reply.

Her brother enters the conversation out of nowhere. "We've discussed it with Dad," he says gravely. "Turns out, it's our call: we can keep you, or we can get a cat and give you away."

In bed, I give Meir the silent treatment.

"But I've read that children can benefit from a pet for their well-being," he offers.

"A child can benefit from a mom now and then, too," I answer, giving him food for thought. (Why can't I ever maintain the silent treatment bit?)

He's somehow not convinced. "Let's try. Just for a few days. Maybe you're not allergic anymore?"

I look at him severely. "I am too! And for God's sake, respect my silent treatment and rub my back!"

The next day, at the shelter, I spot a cheerful kitten. He laughs and plays with his buddies, until he spots my family. Then, right away, he lies down on his side and meows in a pitiful way. I hate the manipulative son-of-a-gun immediately.

In the car, after he throws up, I'm ready to offer him up, but due to my family's declaration in regard to my place on the food chain, I say nothing. But I do sneeze 28 times before we get home.

NEW TO CANADA
By NINA SHENHAV

The kids and Meir are having a blast. I've gotta hand it to them (as they hand me my tissues) – they really are committed. Sneezy gets to be fed, cleaned and put to sleep (no, not that way, unfortunately), all with unconditional devotion. And then, comes day number 2...

It seems that Sneezy's grace has begun to fade away. Sentences such as "It's YOUR turn to clean up his kitty litter!" Or "YOU should brush him before he swallows his fur and chokes [God willing!]" waft through the house. Plus, Sneezy isn't allowed to cower on the kids' beds, only on the couch, the armchairs, the loveseats and my bed.

As days go by, I start to get used to the situation. We buy a year's supplies of tissues, and we watch as our expensive pieces of furniture give their lives for the sake of animal rights.

As for Sneezy? He treats me as if I'm his Jezebel and runs away every time he sees me coming. That is, if we have company.

When we're by ourselves (which is most of the time), he jumps on my lap passionately and purrs with satisfaction.

He's really gotten to know me, the little guy. The only time he avoids me when we're alone is when a tissue isn't attached to my nose (then he doesn't recognize me). But that seldom happens, so I can't complain.

Get up and get moving

There is an overwhelming amount of research today confirming that exercise leads to a longer, healthier, higher quality of life. Yet 53 per cent of men and 68 per cent of woman remain inactive.

The National Academy of Sciences recommends an hour a day of physical activity for maximum health benefits. We know that any amount of exercise, at any age, is beneficial, but generally, the more you do, the better the results.

FITNESS CORNER
By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Exercise helps prevent heart disease by strengthening the heart, lowering blood pressure and increasing good cholesterol while decreasing bad. Moving your body enhances overall blood flow by enlarging blood vessels and arteries, thus reducing your risk of Alzheimer's disease, dementia and stroke by up to 20 per cent.

Regular exercise reduces body fat and increases muscle mass, and thus improves your body's ability to burn calories, lowering your risk for obesity and decreasing the stress on the joints. Weight-bearing exercise promotes bone formation, reducing your risk for osteoporosis.

When you lose weight through exercise, you increase your body's insulin sensitivity, which decreases both blood sugar and cholesterol levels. A study published in the Annals of Internal Medicine found that a brisk walk for an hour a day reduced the risk of Type 2 diabetes by 34 per cent.

Strengthening core muscles and increasing flexibility improve posture and help prevent or manage back pain. Building muscle and cardiovascular endurance increases energy and allows for freedom of movement and a higher quality of life.

Exercise helps the body cope with stress, depression and anxiety by causing the release of chemicals into the brain called endorphins, which improve your mood, both during and after the workout is finished.

It can also prevent certain types of cancer by helping regulate hormone levels throughout your body.

Physical activity can even help you get an easier, deeper sleep, and it is well known how important a good night's sleep is for cellular reproduction and repair.

So, what are you waiting for? Get up and get moving. Want to learn more, contact me at www.felycesfitness.ca

Happy birthday, Mom

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Often women do not like to announce their age, so suffice it to say, on May 2, my mother turned an age older than 29 and younger than 81. Mazel tov, Mom.

Between the two world wars, a little girl was born to Hinda and Moishe Chaim Flicht. They named her Gitel. She was Menashe's younger sister and Meyer's older one. Gitel was adorable. She bobbed her hair and had straight bangs.

URBAN WRITER

Of course, there were lots of people living in the Flicht house on Oxford Street in Toronto, next to the pop factory, so Hinda was busy. That translated into Gitel, at four years old, babysitting and pushing her little brother, Meyer, around in the stroller, up Oxford to Augusta Avenue, along Nassau Street to Spadina Avenue and back to Oxford. Once she left Meyer by Weinstein's grocery. She went to play. Why not! He was okay, but Hinda wasn't great.

Gitel was a hardy little girl brought up by the sweetest of parents. Their deep love of family would serve her well throughout her life, particularly later on when she would become a rebbetzin. But we're not there yet.

Everyone was involved in fighting the Nazis, including Gitel.

At 12 years old, in the summer of 1942, she, Meyer, and her cousin, Fishie, collected comic books door to door and sold them at the corner of Spadina and College Street. There, they stood near the bank, encouraging passersby to buy the books to help the victims of the bombings in Britain. They raised $1200.

Gitel was always an "A" student, both at Lansdowne Public School, where she won an oratorical contest, and at Central High School of Commerce.

And she was athletic, as were her brothers. Menashe was a football and basketball player and swimmer and Meyer, a baseball pitcher and later a handball player.

At Central Commerce, Gitel was the captain of the girl's basketball, baseball, and volleyball teams; played on the winning badminton team and was on the regular swimming team and ornamental swimming team. Today, she continues to swim laps every day.

The '40s passed and news came that six million Jews had been slaughtered, including Gitel's Uncle Moishe, his wife and two children, shot in their village of Wirzbnik, Poland. Gitel's bubbie went into bed upon hearing the news and never came out. But Gitel's spirit continued to soar.

In 1953, she married Shragah Phyvle, a Jewish leader who had saved war orphans and launched the Agudah in Toronto. He was a rabbi. That suited the Flichts just fine.

Gitel and Phyvle moved to Kitchener, Ont., and for 36 years worked hand-in-hand leading the Jewish community as rebbetzin and rabbi. Her job was demanding, but she was splendid. She took care of her five children and people in need who lived in the family's house, taught in Talmud Torah, and belonged to the Hadassah and other committees.

In 1989, her beloved Phyvle died. In 1991, she married Marcus Weinberger. (Gitel accepted Marcus' proposal knowing he had cancer. Through her unconquerable love, she gave him another 11 years of life). Phyvle taught Gitel about her Jewish spirit and Marcus showed her the world.

Today, my beautiful mother, with baby-pink skin, has over 25 grandchildren and more than 20 great-grandchildren. She tends to each one, and makes all of us feel that we are her favourite. She is an entrepreneur and a fine businesswomen.

Happy birthday, Mom! I believe you have personified Jonathan Swift's words: "May you live all the days of your life. You should be well and healthy until 120."

By the way, I know I'm your favourite!

We turn not older with years, but newer every day.

Netanyahu to visit Canada

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu plans to be in Canada on May 31.

During his working visit, he will meet Prime Minister Stephen Harper and senior Canadian officials.

Netanyahu will be accompanied by two of his ministers, Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz and Diaspora Affairs Minister Yuli Edelstein.

As the first Israeli prime minister to set foot in Canada since Yitzhak Rabin's trip in 1994, Netanyahu is expected to pay visits to Ottawa and Toronto.

"It is a pleasure to welcome Prime Minister Netanyahu to Canada," Harper said in a statement. "Our countries have a close and enduring friendship, which we are working to further strengthen."

He added: "There is tremendous respect in Canada for the courage, resilience and determination of Israel and its people."

Benjamin Netanyahu

Harper and Netanyahu spoke on the phone on April 30 to discuss the visit, which coincides with the 60th anniversary of Canada-Israel diplomatic relations

Harper has forged close ties with Israel since becoming prime minister in 2006, having been supportive of Israel during the Second Lebanon War and its invasion of the Gaza Strip in 2009.

Netanyahu and his entourage will fly to Canada from Paris, the headquarters of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development.

The OECD has invited Israel to be a member and will officially accept Israel into its membership later this month when Netanyahu is in Paris.

David Weinberg, director of the Canada-Israel Committee's Israel office, said that Netanyahu's planned visit to Canada is "a reflection of the extraordinarily close ties between Canada and Israel on a wide range of political issues and bilateral matters," as well as "an acknowledgment of Prime Minister Harper's principled leadership and friendship for Israel."

Man Awaits Sentence

GUELPH, Ont. — An 83-year-old German-born man who scrawled anti-Semitic symbols and graffiti in public spots around Guelph, Ont., last year is expected to be sentenced this week. Max Mahr, who pleaded guilty in March to wilfully promoting hatred against Jews, was to have been sentenced last week, but the judge in the case said he needed more time to consider an argument made jointly by the Crown and defence that a sentence served in the community might be fair, given Mahr's age and that he was a product of his times, having served in the German army and been indoctrinated by Hitler Youth. Mahr admitted to scrawling hateful messages in washrooms in a mall, as well as in a Walmart, Chapters and Pizza Pizza. Police also caught him on video in a park, the Guelph Mercury reported. The incidents occurred between January 2009 and September 2009.

Galloway Ousted

LONDON — British MP and strident critic of Israel George Galloway won't be in the next British Parliament. Galloway, running for the Respect-Unity party, placed third in the London riding of Poplar and Limehouse, losing to Labour minister Jim Fitzpatrick. Galloway was elected MP in the London riding of Bethnal Green and Bow in 2005. The May 6 vote failed to produce a parliamentary majority, with the Tories getting the most seats, with Labour in second and the Liberal Democrats third. Galloway is the subject of a court case in Canada, which banned him from entering the country last year over his support for Hamas.

Dershowitz Courted

JERUSALEM — Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz reportedly turned down an offer to serve as Israel's UN ambassador. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman courted the well-known U.S. lawyer, Yediot Achronot reported. If he had accepted the post, Dershowitz , 72, would have had to make aliyah.

Home Vandalized

BERKELEY, Calif. — The home of Rabbi Michael Lerner, editor of the progressive Tikkun magazine, was vandalized. Posters attached to his door and the fence around his Berkeley home attacking him personally, and liberals and progressives, as being supporters of terror and "Islamofascism," the magazine said. The vandalism was discovered the morning of May 3. It followed a week in which Tikkun and Rabbi Lerner received hate mail, apparently because Tikkun said it would give controversial Judge Richard Goldstone its Tikkun Award. Some have pilloried Goldstone, a South African, for his United Nations report that accused Israel and Hamas of war crimes and possible crimes against humanity in the Gaza war. No one has claimed responsibility for the vandalism.

Talks Discuss Report

CAPE TOWN — A delegation of senior South African Jewish leaders met Judge Richard Goldstone May 3 to discuss his participation in the 2009 UN fact-finding mission into the Gaza war and his committee's report. The talks were part of a deal between the South African Zionist Federation (SAZF) and Goldstone that allowed him to attend his grandson's bar mitzvah May 1 without protests. The SAZF said the talks were "frank and open" and included "the hurt and concerns" of South African Jews about his report, which accused Israel and Hamas of war crimes and possible crimes against humanity.

Suspect Arrested

PARIS — A man suspected of playing a major role in the attack on an elderly Jewish man in southern France is being held for questioning by police. The "No. 1 suspect" in a May 2 attack in the town of Nimes on a 78-year-old Jewish man was arrested May 4 and was being questioned, police said. The suspect, whose name wasn't released, is in his 30s and lives in the area. The victim was attacked with tear gas not far from his shul. One of the synagogue doors was vandalized with the words "F--- the Jew." Police are looking for two other suspects seen on shul surveillance cameras. The incident follows an April 30 attack in which a man wearing a kippah was attacked by two knife-wielding men with a metal bar in Strasbourg.

Newspaper Removed

LONDON — The student newspaper at a British university was removed from campus after publishing a comment by a Palestinian journalist seen as derogatory toward Jews. Sameh Habeeb, owner of the Palestinian Telegraph newspaper, told a reporter for the Leeds Student at Leeds University that mainstream media "have a hidden agenda." "They are certainly pro-Israeli," Habeeb said. "I think you have to ask yourself who controls the media." The April 30 issue was removed by order of the Students' Union. One of the officers is Jewish, the Jewish Chronicle reported. A Facebook group against the decision has more than 700 members.

Prof's Human Rights Complaint Dismissed

TORONTO — A human rights complaint by York University history professor David Noble that York discriminated against him for protesting its former policy of cancelling classes on the High Holidays has been dismissed.

In a decision released late last month, the Human Rights Tribunal of Ontario said there was "no pattern of reprisal" and no proof York gave Noble unpopular Friday teaching time for protesting the practice, which was changed last year. The tribunal also ruled York didn't retaliate against Noble for issuing a press release saying York's fundraising foundation was controlled by the "Israeli lobby."

The ruling did say, however, that "the evidence does show that the complainant's activities in relation to other matters, such as challenging limits on campus demonstrations, participating in campus debate on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and exploring and publishing on the issue of interlocking corporate directorships did result in the respondent considering, or taking action against him."

Noble told the Toronto Star that while he was "on some level disappointed," the tribunal did note that he might have faced reprisal for other activities on campus.

Atwood accepts major Israeli literary prize

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Celebrated Canadian author Margaret Atwood has accepted a prestigious Israeli literary prize, despite being urged to boycott it because of Israel's treatment of the Palestinians.

On Sunday night, Atwood and Indian novelist Amitav Ghosh each were awarded half of the $1-million Dan David Prize at Tel Aviv University (TAU).

The novelists both faced pressure from their peers to refuse it.

In an interview with Bloomberg News prior to the award ceremony, Atwood said: "We don't do cultural boycotts," adding that "I would be throwing overboard the thousands of writers around the world who are in prison, censored, exiled and murdered for what they have published."

In an open letter to Atwood last week, Rob Maguire, editor of Saskatoon-based Art Threat magazine, called on her to reject the prize so as not to lend support to an Israeli government that "systematically abuses the human rights of Palestinians."

Numerous similar letters were written to Atwood and Ghosh in the months prior to their acceptance of the prize.

In April, Toronto filmmaker John Greyson – who led the campaign to boycott the Toronto International Film Festival last year because of its special focus on films about Tel Aviv – asked Atwood to decline the prize in order to recognize "the growing boycott movement which is trying to achieve peace in the region."

Margaret Atwood

In another letter, from the Gaza-based Palestinian Students' Campaign for the Academic Boycott of Israel (PSCABI), Atwood was told not to accept the prize because she would be "giving a slight and inadvertent nod to Israel's policy of ethnic cleansing and genocide."

But in a joint response to their detractors posted on Atwood's blog after their win, Atwood and Ghosh said they were no one's pawns.

"The letters we have received have ranged from courteous and sad to factual and practical to accusatory, outrageous, and untrue in their claims and statements; some have been frankly libelous, and even threatening. Some have been willing to listen to us, others have not: they want our supposedly valuable 'names,' but not our actual voices."

In their joint acceptance speech, Ghosh and Atwood said novelists don't deal in absolutes.

"Both of us were urged by some people and groups not to come to Israel on this occasion. We were told that no artist should attend any cultural event here – no matter how hopeful and moderate such an event might be – considering the unequal, unjust, and harsh and dangerous conditions of the Palestinian people in the occupied territories," Ghosh said.

Atwood continued: "Propaganda deals in absolutes: in yes and no. But the novel is a creature of nuance: of perhaps, of maybe… when we said we felt the urgent necessity of keeping doors open, we were informed that we were deluded, and worse."

Attempting to put their positions on the Israel-Palestinian issue into context, the novelists said they hoped that all people who "truly want a chance for Palestinian people to be able to live a decent life, to be compensated for what they have wrongfully lost, and for the destruction of their infrastructures – and all those who hope Israelis will be able to live without rocket fire, bombings, and worse – can only wish [peace talks] well, trust that those engaging in them are doing so seriously and in good faith, and hope that a fair and secure two-state solution will finally result."

The Dan David Prize is awarded annually from an endowment by the Dan David Foundation at TAU.

The CJN's efforts to contact Atwood for comment were unsuccessful.

'A devastatingly sad day'

From the editor's desk...

Last week, the ivy on the brick and concrete walls on the exteriors of the buildings of Brandeis University outside of Boston was considerably ruffled.

Controversy erupted in the famed liberal arts college named after Louis Brandeis, the first Jewish justice on the Supreme Court of the United States and noted Zionist activist.

A great many students and faculty were upset that Israel's ambassador to Washington, Michael Oren, would receive an honorary doctorate from the school and had been asked to deliver the keynote address to the graduating class on May 23.

The student newspaper, the Justice, was highly critical of the university's decision, JTA reported.

"Mr. Oren is a divisive and inappropriate choice for keynote speaker at commencement, and we disapprove of the University's decision to grant someone of his polarity on this campus that honour... The invitation constitutes at best naivete and at worst disregard concerning the reality of the range of student political orientation on this campus."

Jeremy Sherer, president of the campus chapter of the left-of-centre Jewish lobby group J Street, is also opposed to the invitation. In an article in the student newspaper, he wrote that he was personally "bothered" by Oren's politics. But "far more important," he added was the "possibility that the ambassador's speech would offend some of the graduates.

To its credit, a spokesperson for J Street actually contradicted its student representative and welcomed the invitation to Oren.

Much harsher criticism was levelled at the university's administration by computer science professor Harry Mairson. He berated the school for inviting an "apologist" for Israel to speak to the graduates. Outraged by Israel's defence of its citizens against the rockets of Hamas, the learned professor said the decision would "compromise Brandeis' commitment to social justice."

The newspaper's editorialist, J Street's student rep and the professor – all for their own reasons – were very obviously upset that the ambassador of Israel had been honoured by the university.

But even some students who did not oppose the decision were cravenly circumspect in its defence.

For example, Heddy Ben-Atar, the student representative on the school's board of trustees, justified the invitation on the basis of Oren's "academic excellence, rigorous research practices and fearlessly honest writing."

Senior graduating-year student Adam Ross urged members of the Brandeis community to "fully embody the rich academic quality and sophistication of our university and receive Ambassador Oren's speech respectfully, regardless of personal opinions regarding the country that Ambassador Oren represents."

Neither Ben-Atar nor Ross could bring themselves to utter the name "Israel."

This reflexively hostile reaction of so many Brandeis students to the invitation extended to Oren should send the red flag of alarm high up on the flagpole of the communal agenda. That a large number of Brandeis students are Jewish should send a shudder of ice-cold air into our hearts.

Rabbi Daniel Gordis, senior vice-president of the Shalem Center in Jerusalem, eloquently summed up the woeful lack of knowledge by the Brandeis students of any aspect but one of Israel's current condition.

"It is a devastatingly sad day for world Jewry," Gordis wrote in his blog, "when those issues [related to the conflict with the Palestinians] are the only ones that one associates with Israel, when mere mention of the Jewish state evokes not the least bit of pride from students graduating from a prestigious institution long associated with the very best of American Jewish life... But that kind of instinctive pride in the Jewish state is, sadly, a vestige of days gone by, even for many American Jews."

Though he craved it with all his heart, Brandeis, alas, did not live to see the establishment of the Jewish state. He died 2-1/2 years before Israel was proclaimed. How cruel a betrayal that 65 years after he died, the students at "his" university should know so little about the cause he championed, and even worse, should care so little.

"The undying longing for Zion is a fact of deepest significance – a manifestation in the struggle for existence... Zionism seeks merely to establish in Palestine for such Jews as choose to go and remain there, and for their descendants, a legally secured home, where they may live together and lead a Jewish life; where they may expect ultimately to constitute a majority of the population, and may look forward to what we may call home rule.

"The establishment of the legally secured Jewish home is no longer a dream. For more than a generation, brave pioneers have been building the foundations of our new-old home. It remains for us to build the superstructure."

Justice Brandeis spoke those words at a conference in 1916 in an address he titled "A Call to the Educated Jew."

At the university that bears his name, how sad and melancholy an irony that so few today can answer his call.

JNF RETURNS TO DOWNSVIEW PARK

The Jewish National Fund and the Downsview Park Foundation held their second annual twinning day on May 6. Fifteen hundred Toronto-area students from grades 3 to 8 planted trees, played sports and attended an educational session. The Twinning Program highlights environmental values shared by Canada and Israel. For each tree planted at Downsview Park, one will be planted in the Toronto Community Forest in Yatir, Israel. Inset is a photo of Alexa Zoltak, left, and Li-elle Rapaport, Grade 5 students at Associated Hebrew Schools, Kamin branch, planting a tree. JNF and Downsview Park will host the second Twinning Program community event on Sept. 26.

Synagogue museum brings Herzl to life

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When Theodor Herzl died in 1904, an estimated 6,000 mourners accompanied the funeral cortege to the Viennese cemetery where he was buried.

Among them were leading figures from the literary world (Herzl was a journalist and playwright), politicians, members of Zionist organizations and, given the scale of the event, scores of common folk from across Europe who came to pay their last respects to the founder of the modern Zionist movement.

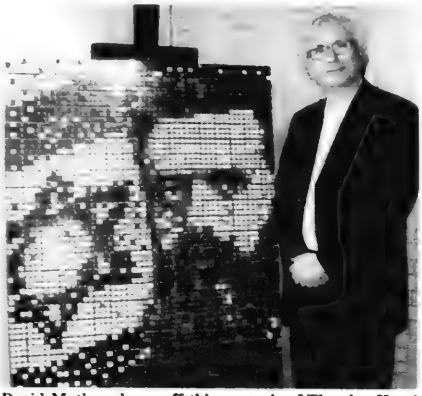
A vintage photograph of the funeral procession is among the many artifacts, pictures, papers, books, stamps, coins, postcards and other ephemera that will be on display at Beth Tzedec Congregation's Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum to honour Herzl on the 150th anniversary of his birth. The exhibit will run from May 12 to Nov. 18.

Herzl died at 44, and in the seven preceding years, he laid the foundation of the modern state of Israel. His influence on the Jewish imagination and on the wider world was reflected in the many everyday objects that were based on his life.

Lawyer David Matlow is a collector of Herzl memorabilia and the artifacts on display at Beth Tzedec are borrowed from his personal collection.

Glass cabinets have been set up in the synagogue's main lobby containing items such as miniature busts, books and magazines – including one from March 1946 from the Bergen-Belsen displaced persons camp with Herzl's visage presiding over an exodus to Palestine. And given that the memorabilia often reflected the communities in which they were created, there is even a Herzl bobblehead hockey doll from the Goodmans law firm annual hockey tournament, which Matlow organizes.

Collecting the everyday objects bearing Herzl's image "was one way to connect with the Zionist dream," Matlow said.



David Matlow shows off this portrait of Theodor Herzl made out of Rubik's Cubes by artist Josh Chalom.

That applies to himself as well.

"Herzl has permeated and has been part of my life since I was a student at [United Synagogue Day School]," he said.

The first piece in his collection was a 1960 poster issued on Herzl's 100th birthday that came from his grandmother's home in Ramat Gan. "Something about the portrait resonated with me," he said. He acquired it after his grandmother died in 1991.

A longtime stamp collector, he found many Israeli stamps that featured Herzl, plus others from such unlikely locations as Australia, Uruguay, Venezuela, Saint Thomas and Chad.

As he collected more and more Herzl objects, he found "the more you get into something, you learn there are more and more things."

"A collector always collects," he said, and last November he purchased 900 items to bring his collection up to 2,000 Herzl and Zionist Congress pieces.

Herzl is a particularly intriguing figure, because of the influence he exerted on the Jewish world, Matlow said.

"He was an outsider in Jewish life. He didn't grow up very identified with the Jewish world" and only became so after covering the Dreyfus trial in France and witnessing an outpouring of anti-Semitic hatred.

In 1896 he wrote The Jewish State and in 1897 convened the first Zionist Congress.

"He started the ball rolling. He took a totally different approach to what was called 'the Jewish question,' through politics and diplomacy."

He predicted the creation of a Jewish state within 50 years and it took only a little more than that before Israel was established, Matlow said.

Staging an exhibit on Herzl educates the public about a history that is not well understood, he continued. "Many think the story of Israel started with what happened in Europe after the Holocaust, with the need to put people someplace from displaced persons camps. But the story of Israel's independence went back well before that."

There were 22 Zionist Congresses up to 1946, he said, and by 1948, when Israel was created, "the Zionist idea had spread all over the world."

"There was a huge effort to cause this miracle to happen, and men and women such as Herzl, who came from outside the mainstream of Jewish life, were able to make a difference. That's why I'm fascinated by Herzl. He did make a difference, and any of us can. He inspired people and he had it right: 'If you will it, it is no dream,'" Matlow said.

New Technion president puts focus on change

Aims to broaden school's student body, research capabilities

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The new president of the Technion, Israel's oldest university, is not asleep at the wheel.

Peretz Lavie, a specialist in sleep research who assumed the presidency last October, is bringing significant and historic changes to the Haifa-based Technion.

Formerly its dean of medicine and vice-president of its resource development and external relations department, Lavie is broadening the Technion's scope in terms of research capabilities and future student body.

A sabra born in Petach Tikvah, he is fostering interdisciplinary research as the pace of scientific and technological knowledge escalates.

Peretz Lavie

Facing the challenge of globalization, Lavie is recruiting students from abroad for the International School of Engineering, which opened in 2009 and whose language of instruction is English, the world's lingua franca.

Lavie, who has published a slew of books and learned articles on the phenomenon of sleep, said that interdisciplinary research has become an absolute necessity as the quantity of knowledge doubles every three to four years.

"Science is now big science," he said in an interview last week. "The sharing of information is essential. Collaboration is needed."

The Technion, which offers degrees in science and engineering and in such related fields as architecture and industrial management and education, has established interdisciplinary programs in four fields: nano sciences, life sciences and engineering, robotics and energy.

In line with these innovative programs, Lavie has recruited 25 new faculty members from abroad, including Canada.

To preserve and improve its ranking as one of the world's top 30 institutes in science and technology, the Technion is recruiting overseas students.

According to the United Nations, 2.5 million students studied abroad in 2007, a figure that is expected to jump to 7.5 million within a decade.

To date, the Technion has recruited 14 students from countries ranging from Canada and the United States to China and India. They will study at the International School of Engineering and take courses in English.

Buoyed by the influx of foreign students, however modest, Lavie hopes that 500 overseas students will be studying at the Technion in four years from now.

The idea of attracting foreign students is really an old one, Lavie explained. During the 1960s, many African students enrolled at the Technion, an experience they never forgot.

"They became ambassadors of good will for Israel. This can happen again."

At a time when Israel's legitimacy is challenged in different quarters, the recruitment of foreign students to Israeli universities is of utmost importance politically. "This will have a long-term impact on Israel," he observed.

Lavie fully agrees that Israel can win the battle for survival only by developing an expert knowledge in technology, as Albert Einstein declared.

"Necessity is the mother of invention," said Lavie.

In the wake of the Six Day War, after France imposed an arms embargo on Israel, the Technion created a microelectronics institute, which produced the first semi-conductors in Israel. These devices played an integral role in the upgrading of Israel's vital defence industry and laid the cornerstone of Israel's high-tech revolution.

Israel's leap into high-tech could not have happened without the Technion's engineering graduates. Since 1924, the Technion has churned out 70,000 engineers. "They built Israel's infrastructure," Lavie said.

Technion graduates also helped build Israel's all-important aeronautical industry. Without it, Israel could not have developed satellites, drones and various defence systems, he said.

Lavie bemoaned as "short-sighted" government cutbacks to Israeli universities. "We've lost 100 faculty members to cutbacks. It's been devastating."

But of late, he added, the government has been singing a new tune. "We'll see if the talk is translated into action."

Lavie is concerned that Israel's elementary and high school education system leaves much to be desired in terms of its effectiveness across the board.

Too many students in government-financed religious schools do not get a sufficient grounding in the liberal arts and mathematics.

"This is an existential threat to Israel," he said, pointing out that such students will represent 50 per cent of Israel's overall student body within a decade.

Praising Technion overseas support groups such as the Canadian Technion Society, he said, "They are critical to our development. We're lucky we have this group of friends."

Demanding trust; creating mistrust

The U.S. State Department was both celebratory and stern on the weekend as it triumphantly announced that the first round of indirect peace talks between Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) was complete. U.S. special envoy George Mitchell left the Middle East and hopes to return to the area in a week to resume his Jerusalem-Ramallah shuttle.

State Department spokesperson Philip Crowley, in a statement that was quite upbeat, said both Israel and the Palestinians had taken steps to create an atmosphere conducive to successful talks. Israel had pledged not to build in the Ramat Shlomo neighbourhood of east Jerusalem for two years and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas vowed that he would work against incitement of any sort. Crowley also warned that Israel and the Palestinians would be held "accountable" for actions that "undermine trust" during the course of the proximity talks.

How inconvenient for the Palestinians, therefore, that on the very same day last weekend that the Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported on the happy completion of the first session of the proximity talks, it also carried a story under the headline: "Israel fights to keep Palestinians from sabotaging its admittance into OECD."

Acceptance into the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) must be approved unanimously, and three of the organization's members – Switzerland, Ireland and Norway – were not boosters of Israel's application. In an attempt to block it, PA Foreign Minister Riyad al-Malki urged the OECD to delay the vote. In correspondence with the OECD member states' foreign ministers, al-Malki accused Israel of infringing "Palestinians' human rights" and "violating OECD values."

As well, Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Salem Fayyad recently called many of the leaders of OECD countries to argue against Israel's acceptance. This was in addition to his much publicized campaign calling for a boycott of Israeli goods produced or grown in the West Bank.

Israel's OECD negotiator, Industry, Trade and Labour Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, said last week that "Fayyad's efforts to thwart Israel's participation in the organization are extremely grave."

Yet, despite the Palestinian' efforts, Israel was unanimously voted into the important 31-member-state OECD on Monday. Membership is a significant endorsement of the Jewish state and will help attract even more foreign investment to the dynamic Israeli economy.

To our mind, Fayyad's behaviour in trying to block Israel's membership falls squarely within what Crowley called actions that "undermine trust" during the course of the proximity talks.

Will he be held accountable by the U.S. government for undermining trust among the Israelis? Given the American administration's record over the past 15 months, it is not very likely.

Pity.

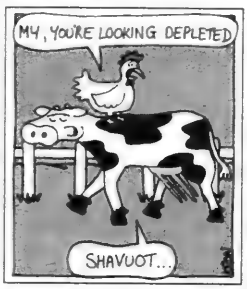
Update on Canadians who fought in Israel

I read with great interest the letter "Remembering the Canadians" (April 29) concerning those who fell in Israel's War of Independence.With reference to the two Torontonians in the Yiftach brigade of the Palmach, Harvey Cohen and Ed Lugech, there are more recent developments that alter the conclusions that the late Eddy Kaplansky shared with the letter writer, Wilf Mandel.

I was the source of Kaplansky's supposition, but subsequently the puzzle of their disappearance was taken up by two Israeli reserve officers charged with the task of determining the status of soldiers missing in action. Since I was the only one who remembered them and had photographs of them, there followed many conversations and a meeting in Israel of some of the unit. Their research determined that they were lost in the battle of Malkiyeh, on the Lebanese border, May 15,1948, not waylaid and killed near the camp of Sarafand.



While DNA research was not permitted by their families, it would seem that the army is satisfied that their remains were found near the battlefield, and have been interred, in a ceremony that took place last year. My thanks to Mandel, whose remembering is of great comfort to those of us who lost so many comrades-in-arms.

Goldstone's attendance at bar mitzvah

It is offensive and outrageous that opponents/critics of Judge Richard Goldstone's report on the war in Gaza threatened to protest against and disrupt his attendance at his grandson's bar mitzvah ("Goldstone will attend grandson's simchah," April 29). That it proved necessary to come to any agreement to permit Goldstone to attend should strike us all as profoundly shocking and frightening.

Dangers posed by IAW crowd

Letter writer Rudy Solomonovici says Israeli Apartheid Week was "practically non-existent" at York this year ("IAW is alienating people," May 6). Well, yes, it was much less apparent than usual, for many reasons that have little to do with anti-Israel militancy and more to do with other factors, one of which is that one of IAW's major supporters, the Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 3903, has been under administration by CUPE national since October 2009 and cannot use funds to help IAW. There was also some, although rather half-hearted, indication on the part of the university administration that events such as last year's would not be tolerated. Disregarding the dangers posed by the IAW crowd at York is unwise and dangerous. IAW may not have been a big thing this year, but it was not for lack of intention, and it would be equally unwise to assume next year will be similar or that no other strong anti-Israel activities will take place. I would love to be wrong.

Herzl not lacking in pragmatism

In "The brooding eyes of a dreamer," it is stated that Theodor Herzl was criticized as lacking in pragmatism (Editor's Desk, April 29). I question this. Herzl's commitment to a Jewish state sent him on a relentless quest for financial and political backing. His message, "If you will it, it is no dream," surely characterizes his pragmatic proactive approach. Moreover, in advocating the Uganda plan after the Russian pogroms, Herzl was surely demonstrating pragmatism. Herzl understood that any port in a storm could realistically provide refuge for those who were awaiting an uncertain future in Zion.

The Jewish Community Service in Miami provided this information: she is Jewish and was 18 years old when she had the baby. Her parents were from England and settled in Toronto, where she was born in 1947 (approximately). Her father was a pharmacist, and her mother was a high school graduate. Her father died in an automobile accident when she was six years old. She was an attractive woman, 5-feet, 1-1/2 inches tall, with brown hair, big brown eyes and well-formed teeth. She enjoyed playing the guitar, singing, dancing and reading. She wanted to working with children and hoped to major in psychology and teach children with problems.

Perspectives

The JCall argument is self-serving

By EMANUELE OTTOLENGHI
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

What are we to make of JCall, the new European liberal Jewish movement launched last week?

Two Jews and three opinions is a tirelessly repeated joke that conveys a sense of how contentious Jewish discord can be. Anyone familiar with Jewish media, organizations and grassroots activism can attest to that – as best characterized by the iconic line in the Monty Python film Life of Brian: "Excuse me. Are you the Judean People's Front?," followed by the response: "F--- off! We're the People's Front of Judea."

In this context, JCall is a welcome addition. Unfortunately, it is a disingenuous one.

Jewish "wars" punctuate Jewish history – Jews revel in their cacophonous legacy, even though historically, it has cost them dearly. Thus swings the Jewish pendulum – publicly, should Jews speak in one voice or air their differences? This question is largely rhetorical: No dispute (Chassidim vs. Mitnagdim; Zionists vs. Bundists; Orthodox vs. Reform; Diasporism vs. Israel-centric; Peace Now vs. Greater Israel) goes unnoticed. Jews argue – in the press, on the air, in academia and across their organizational alphabet soup. These days, such discord is even easier to conduct. In the Internet age, anyone can express an opinion – however different from the mainstream – without much effort, financial or otherwise.

Enter JCall, a group of European Jewish individuals and organizations mainly from the left. Their online petition, recently launched at a well-attended event in the European Parliament, alleges that the view it reflects finds no representation in the mainstream Jewish establishment, because of a presumed tendency of Jewish organizations to uncritically support any Israeli policy while silencing internal dissent.

The "uncritical support for Israeli policy" charge sets the stage for the JCallers' arguments: Israel's settlement policy is disastrous because it stands in the way of the two-state solution and will lead to the demise of the Zionist dream. Europe must pressure Israel to reverse this policy. And Jews, spearheaded by JCall, must break their communal code of silence and persuade Israel to heed this pressure.

Of the three arguments, the last is the most befuddling, and not just because the allegation of a code of silence, more suitable to the Mafia, is hardly applicable to the Jewish world. JCallers' views are the most mainstream and least contentious one can think of in the European landscape. If JCallers seek to promote a firm European stance against Israeli settlement policy, then they should already proclaim victory and go home. In Europe, Israel lost this argument long ago. If they seek to speak out, there is no shortage of sponsors who will gladly give JCallers a platform. By contrast, outside the narrow and largely parochial world of small-circulation Jewish media, only a handful of extravagantly pro-Israel magazines and papers – themselves with a small and dwindling readership – will give Israel's case a fair hearing.

> No mainstream European Jewish organization stands today against the two-state solution

Anyone familiar with the European lecture circuit on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict knows that speakers are rarely to the right of the JCall signatories themselves. They, not those whom they attack for supposedly silencing them, form the mainstream of public debate.

Any one of the almost 5,000 signatories to the JCall petition who can write, therefore, stands a chance of airing his or her views. Besides, many Jewish organizations stand behind the initiative. The suggestion that the Jewish establishment is silencing them is puzzling. They are the Jewish establishment – the intelligentsia, the academics, the cultural circles. The dark imagery alleging an uncritical Jewish leadership that sings from an Israeli score sheet while silencing dissenters smacks of insincerity. The self-depiction of a "band of brothers" intent on challenging the dominant paradigm is self-indulgent counterculture by self-important sofa intellectuals. It is far from the truth.

No mainstream European Jewish organization stands today against the two-state solution, or applauds, supports or fundraises for settlement activities. From left to right, organized Jewry across Europe tends to reflect Israeli political divisions on the existential questions Israel faces, including vociferous anti-Zionist groups on the margins of Jewish communal life but in the spotlight of public debate. It is hardly surprising then that JCallers feel on the margins: their views fail to strike a chord, not because of internal censorship, but rather because, having seen the Oslo process shipwreck and a decade of Palestinian violent rejectionism, not many Jews are convinced that peace will come on the wings of more Israeli concessions alone.

The JCall argument is also self-serving, because it allows the group to don the mantle of victimhood. By depicting criticism as censorship, the JCallers spare themselves the need to engage criticism, since anyone disagreeing can be dismissed as a censor.

Still, if their presumably unflinching support for Israel coupled with their discomfort with Israel's settlement policies reflect mainstream views, why have they been immediately met with a torrent of criticism?

First, because such is the nature of Jewish debate. JCallers should take their critics seriously rather than pre-emptively dismissing them.

Second, because their pledged love for Israel is overshadowed by the blame they squarely lay at Israel's doorstep. For them, solving the conflict is all about settlements. Not Palestinian civil wars, Palestinian rejectionism, Hamas, Hezbollah, terrorism, not even Iran: Israel's settlements are the epicentre of all troubles. They will find few Jews ready to endorse this worldview.

European Jews have been at the forefront of peace initiatives, reconciliation efforts and interfaith dialogue for as long as one can remember. JCall offers nothing new. In contrast, an equivalent "call to reason" among Arab and Muslim intellectuals across the Islamic world and beyond – now that would be news! Only when Israel's enemies choose moderation over extremism will peace stand a chance. When that moment comes – and only dreamers can see it coming today – settlements will not be an obstacle.

European Jews get their own J Street

By DINAH SPRITZER and TOBY AXELROD
JTA

PRAGUE — The launch of JCall has brought the debate that American Jewry has seen over J Street to Jewish Europe: outside of Israel, how critical in public should you be of Israeli government policies you believe are not in Israel's best interests?

The founders of JCall, who seek to push what they see as a recalcitrant Israeli government closer to a two-state solution, say criticism of Israeli policies is constructive and necessary.

"All of us are Zionists, but by the same token we can express our ideas about the situation and the two-state solution," David Chemla, a JCall co-founder and the head of Peace Now in France, told JTA. "It is sane to have the debate openly and not leave it to the radicals."

But the emergence of JCall, which held its official launch last week at the European Parliament in Brussels, has aggravated European Jewish communal leaders with a long tradition of unconditional defence of Israel. The European Jewish Congress, an umbrella group representing elected European Jewish community leaders, condemned JCall's petition calling for European pressure on Israel's government as "divisive, counter-productive and unhelpful."

"It is important to note that continued one-sided pressure on Israel does not encourage the Palestinians to engage in serious negotiations and only endangers the already unstable situation in the region," European Jewish Congress president Moshe Kantor said, arguing that JCall represents a minority viewpoint in Europe.

The debate JCall has engendered in Europe mirrors the one in the United States ever since the left-wing, pro-Israel lobbying group J Street was founded in 2008 as an alternative to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee. Chemla and other JCall leaders said they were inspired by J Street.

So far, the group's main activity has been to amass signatures for an online petition calling for the European Union to pressure Israel and the Palestinians to agree to a two-state solution, repudiating blind support for Israeli policies, and affirming that the establishment of a viable and sovereign Palestinian state is vital to Israel's survival as a Jewish and democratic state. The group says it is nonpartisan.

"The European Jewish Call for Reason," as the JCall petition is titled, seeks to "allow the opinions of European Jews, who have been silent for too long, to be expressed publicly and to allow a Jewish voice to be heard that is both committed to the state of Israel and critical of the current choices of its government."

As of last week, the petition had some 5,000 signatories.

Among JCall's supporters are some prominent French Jews, including philosopher Bernard Henri-Levy and essayist Alain Finkielkraut, as well as Jews from Belgium, Britain, Germany and Switzerland. Prominent Israelis – including Avi Primor, a former Israeli ambassador to Germany, and Elie Barnavi, a former Israeli ambassador to France – showed up at the Brussels launch to lend support to the cause.

Opinions

He should have been shunned

The (Goldstone) Report on the United Nations Fact finding Mission on the Gaza Conflict is recognized as one of the most harmful indictments of Israel in modern times, even prompting Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to list it among Israel's three major strategic challenges, the others being the Iranian nuclear program and rockets aimed at Israeli civilians.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

And while it was enthusiastically endorsed by its sponsors, the United Nations Human Rights Council, which is of course not surprising, the report has been otherwise exposed for what it really is – a travesty based on faulty premises, flawed methodology and biased conclusions. Even its author, South African Justice Richard Goldstone, has admitted that "if this was a court of law, there would have been nothing proven."

Given such fallout, one might have expected someone in Goldstone's position to find a way to dissociate himself from the document, denounce it and try to make amends for his obvious lack of judgement. Sadly, Goldstone chose none of these options, preferring instead to defend his findings publicly and unashamedly.

Consequently, he has been shunned by the Jewish mainstream worldwide, and deservedly so. But just how his ostracism would play out if he wished to attend a social or religious event within the Jewish community has only just been tested.

What set the stage was the bar mitzvah of his grandson in South Africa earlier this month. Initial indications were that, on the urging of the South African Zionist Federation, an agreement with the family had been reached whereby Goldstone would not attend the synagogue service. But this news had hardly hit the wires before a wave of protest erupted against what was portrayed as an unseemly action against a fellow Jew.

The ensuing retreats, filled with hypocrisy and melodrama, were mostly rather pathetic. South Africa's chief rabbi bellyached about the "sacred principle of open shuls" while the head of the United Herzlia Schools in Cape Town urged the community to "embrace diversity and difference of opinion." The chairman of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, Zev Krengel, stated similarly that "diversity of opinion in our community needs to be tolerated and respected." Meanwhile it was decided that Goldstone would attend the bar mitzvah after all.

It would have been commendable had South Africa's rabbinate and community leadership acted with common purpose when dealing with Goldstone's visit. Instead, their sycophantic backpedalling and inconsistent messaging have given a perception of welcome, rather than disapproval, to someone whose actions have energized Israel's enemies and sought to discredit those who support the Jewish state. What sort of example is this for a bar mitzvah boy?

Legal complexities in an outpost of heroes

Maj. Roi Klein and Maj. Eliraz Peretz had a lot in common. Both were in their early 30s and served as deputy battalion commanders in the Israel Defence Forces' Golani Brigade – Klein in the 51st, Peretz in the 12th. Both were killed in action.

Klein fell in July 2006, during the Second Lebanon War. He heroically leapt on a hand grenade thrown at his unit during a battle in the town of Bint Jbeil, saving his soldiers' lives. Peretz was killed this past March. His unit came under fire while patrolling the Gaza border. In one exchange of fire, a shot hit Peretz's grenade pouch, causing it to explode. He and one of his soldiers were killed instantly.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Peretz's death was particularly tragic. Twelve years ago his brother, Uriel, also a commander in the Golani Brigade, was killed in action in southern Lebanon. With Eliraz's falling, the Peretz family joined a list of 60-plus Israeli families who have lost more than one family member serving in the IDF.

Klein and Peretz had other things in common. Both were Orthodox and had young families. Klein had two children, Peretz four, the youngest only two months old. Both also chose to live in a place called Hayovel, just south of the West Bank settlement of Eli. Yovel in Hebrew means Jubilee. The outpost was set up in 1998, during Israel's 50th year.

There's a complication to the already sad story of these two heroes. For almost five years, Hayovel has been subject to legal actions because it's an unauthorized outpost.

In September, 2005 Peace Now petitioned the High Court of Justice to order the destruction of 12 homes built in Hayovel. During the years the case has been before the Supreme Court, the state confirmed the homes in Hayovel were built illegally, most of them on land believed to be state-owned but some partially or wholly on privately owned Palestinian property.

While affirming the need to effectively remove all unlawful construction, the state informed the court that manpower and budgetary constraints make it impossible to immediately destroy all illegal building in Judea and Samaria, and that it has drafted a priority list for execution of demolition orders. According to this list, court-ordered demolitions will be the first to be executed. Next, construction still in preliminary stages will be destroyed. After that, in descending order, demolition orders will be carried out on buildings erected on privately owned Palestinian land, on non-government property, in unauthorized outposts established since March 2001 (a date significant because of a commitment by former prime minister Ariel Sharon to the Bush administration to dismantle all outposts established after it), those built on outposts inaugurated before this date, buildings constructed outside approved zoning areas, and finally all other illegal construction.

Given these criteria, last July, the court ordered the state to provide a schedule for dismantling homes in Hayovel, after hearing relevant homeowner objections. After further extensions, the court directed the state to submit its response by May 1.

Peretz was killed in the interim, and since then, politicians have been visiting his and Klein's homes, demanding the government retroactively authorize all buildings in Hayovel not erected on Palestinian property.

Defence Minister Ehud Barak, who's responsible for law enforcement in the West Bank, recently notified the court that given current circumstances in Hayovel, it would be inappropriate to provide a timeline for its dismantling at present. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told his party's caucus he's investigating ways of approving some of the buildings in the outpost.

Peace Now also understands the sensitivity of the matter and recently issued a statement declaring that while it's "outrageous that the army allows career officers to live in outposts… [Peace Now is] considering amending the petition to not include the houses of the fallen. We are attentive to the pain of the families, like all of Israel."

The case is far from over. It's yet another example of complexities that are dealt with in this country, especially when soldiers' blood is involved. And not a word has been said about the United States and what it will have to say on the issue.

After 62 years, Israel has much to celebrate

As an Israeli academic and pundit, part of my job is to read, watch and listen to what other talking heads are saying about us. Over the years, I've learned to have low expectations, both from Israeli and foreign journalists, who often put their own agendas and moods into news articles and analyses. (I admit to occasionally falling into the same trap – so caveat emptor.)

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

For many, analyzing Israel has become an exercise in gloom and doom, and this pessimism has dominated stories recently. Yom Ha'atzmaut (Independence Day) is a prime time for musing about the general state of the Jewish state, both externally and internally, and this year's analyses have been particularly ominous. In the New York Times, Ethan Bronner's Memo from Jerusalem was headlined "Mood Is Dark as Israel Marks 62nd Year as a Nation." Israel's zealous prophets warned of impending wars, civil strife and overall disaster.

In contrast, the prevailing mood was far from dark on Israel's streets, parks, beaches, and pre-holiday marketplaces. We joined thousands of Israelis packing Jerusalem's newly renovated Mamilla arcade, which leads to the brightly lit ancient remains of David's Citadel and Jaffa Gate. The diverse crowd enjoyed re-enactments of historic moments in the city's 3,000-year history, followed by a sing-along.

This scene wasn't merely an exercise in nostalgia or escapism, but a popular and deeply felt statement of freedom and homecoming. For many Israeli Jews (journalists and doomsayers excepted), every day is Independence Day. Despite the wars and hatred, both in the Arab and Muslim worlds, and increasingly on university campuses, newspaper columns and blogs, we are here – an independent, sovereign Jewish nation, able to defend our interests after 2,000 years of exile. From the perspective of Jewish history, 62 years is a very short time. The taste of independence, with its accompanying responsibility for both accomplishments and failures, is still exhilarating.

While media headlines continue to highlight threats of war from Hamas and Hezbollah, and the Iranian regime pursues nuclear weapons designed to crush the "Zionist entity," the national mood also reflects a renewed self-confidence that these enemies can be deterred, and if necessary, defeated. For Israelis who still hear the echoes of Palestinian mass terror bombings, our Independence Day stroll through Jerusalem was also a quiet celebration marking the defeat of Yasser Arafat's terror war.

Economically, Israel has emerged from the global recession almost unscathed – the shekel is more stable and stronger than either the dollar or the euro. The best-selling book Start-up Nation, which examines Israel's emergence as a leading hi-tech innovator, is as much a confident statement about the future as it is a history of this unexpected success.

Certainly there's concern about the signs of tension coming out of Washington, and, among some, fear of efforts to impose a counterproductive and unsustainable peace process. But some of this is overreaction and media hype, fanned by pundits with vested interests in overstating the friction.

Demonization of Israel – with its boycotts and bogus accusations of "war crimes," as reflected and promoted by Judge Richard Goldstone and his supporters – is also threatening. But there's a sense that this threat has overreached and is descending into absurdity and hysteria. Groups such as Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International, and their numerous Israeli and Palestinian allies, which have led this political warfare campaign, have been exposed as hypocritical and far from the "moral watchdogs" that they claim to be.

Internally, we have more than enough problems, including continuing revelations of massive corruption among former officials, compounded by an ongoing leadership crisis. There's plenty work to do for the next generation of Israel's leaders, whomever they turn out to be.

Yet, standing with crowds outside of Jerusalem's ancient walls at sunset, singing classic Zionist hits, our internal conflicts also seemed overstated. Amid the cacophony of Hebrew – with Russian, English, Italian, Ethiopian, and many other accents – and the full range of Jerusalem costumes, from sandals and miniskirts to black hats and coats, there was more unity than discord.

The Kirshner File

A 'miracle of resurrection' in the Netherlands

"This was a very deep wound," said Johannes Houwink ten Cate, a seasoned historian affiliated with the Centre for Holocaust and Genocide Studies in Amsterdam. "But Jews have managed to reconstruct and reorganize their lives." Pausing momentarily, he added, "It's a miracle of resurrection. It's a small miracle that Jews are still here."

Sheldon Kirshner in Amsterdam

Ten Cate, a specialist in the Nazi persecution of Jews, was referring to the sombre yet uplifting fact that while the Holocaust in the Netherlands claimed the lives of 107,000 Jews, or 78 per cent of Dutch Jewry, the highest death rate in western Europe, the Jewish community nevertheless managed to rebuild itself in a gradual postwar recovery.

On the eve of Germany's invasion on May 10, 1940, the Netherlands was home to approximately 160,000 Jews – 140,000 full Jews, 15,000 half-Jews and 5,000 quarter- Jews – comprising about 1.5 per cent of a total population of nine million.

The Nazi occupiers deported Jews mainly to Auschwitz and Sobibor via the Westerbork camp. Five thousand of the deportees survived their ordeal. Of the 25,000 Jews who went into hiding with the help of Christians, including Anne Frank, one-third were betrayed and killed.

These catastrophic statistics are jarring, since the Netherlands was a tolerant nation that admitted Sephardi Jews after the Inquisition and about 20,000 German Jews and 3,000 Polish Jews during the 1930s. It should also be recalled that pogroms were alien to the Dutch spirit. But with the Nazi conquest 65 years ago this month, the Netherlands was turned into a grim killing field.

To add insult to injury, Jewish survivors met with "a cold and bureaucratic reception" from the Dutch government after the war, according to a telling exhibit at the Jewish Historical Museum in Amsterdam.

Proceeding from the strange assumption that the survivors should not be treated preferentially, since Dutch Christians had also suffered terribly and had been the victims of Nazi oppression and mass hunger, the government failed to take measures to address problems specifically pertaining to Jews. Amid this atmosphere, 9,800 Dutch Jews emigrated between 1950 and 1986, their destinations ranging from Israel and the United States to Canada and Australia.

"Jewish survivors were coolly received," observed Ten Cate, who previously worked at the Netherlands Institute for War Documentation and now teaches at the University of Amsterdam. "Perhaps Dutch Christians thought that returning Jews would rob them of their victimhood." By his estimate, 150,000 Dutch civilians were killed or died during the initially benign but increasingly brutal German occupation. A further 2,500 Dutch soldiers fell in battle during the Nazi invasion.

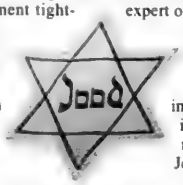
By whatever yardstick, the Holocaust has had a devastating impact on Dutch Jews. Ten Cate likens it to a trauma. Ruben Vis, the secretary-general of the Amsterdam-based Central Jewish Organization and the son of Holocaust survivors whose ancestors settled in the Netherlands four centuries ago, explained that the low rate of affiliation in the 40,000-strong Jewish community, bolstered by the addition of 10,000 to 15,000 Israelis in recent years, is directly related to the enormous losses sustained by the prewar community.

"After the Holocaust, Jews didn't want to be registered as Jews," said Vis, a Liberal party member of the North Holland state parliament. What he means is abundantly clear. Having had easy access to Jewish community membership rolls, the Nazis had no real trouble identifying Jews, some of whom were forcibly concentrated in Amsterdam.

Vis' father was hidden by Dutch Christians, but his mother was shipped to Theresienstadt. While he deeply appreciates the life-saving assistance his father received, he thinks that more could have done to protect Jews in their darkest hour. "The Dutch aren't the bravest people in the world," he mused. "They follow the flow."

On the eve of the Nazi invasion, the Netherlands had a fairly liberal refugee policy. But as the economic crisis worsened during the Depression, the Dutch government tightened entry regulations. Fearing an upsurge of anti-Semitism, Dutch Jewish leaders rallied behind this policy, said Ten Cate.

During this period, German Jewish refugees were virtually prohibited from legally working. Those who were jobless lived on their savings or were assisted by the Dutch Jewish community and the "Joint."



The Dutch yellow star in the Netherlands

In a sign of the times, the Jewish community was asked to defray expenses for the construction of the Westerbork work camp, where some refugees were housed. In the wake of Kristallnacht in Germany, the Netherlands closed its borders to refugees.

The Netherlands, having been neutral in World War I, hoped it could remain neutral again, a conviction buttressed by Adolf Hitler's insincere assurance that Germany would honour its neutrality. But in a shocking blitzkreig, Germany broke its promise. The poorly equipped Dutch army resisted, but on the fifth day of the invasion, the German Air Force bombed Rotterdam, killing nearly 1,000 civilians and causing widespread property damage. Cowed by the threat of further German bombing raids, the Netherlands surrendered.

Shortly afterward, Germany imposed a Nazi-controlled administration on the Netherlands under the overall direction of Arthur Seyss-Inquart. At first, as American researcher Anthony Anderson suggests, Germany respected Dutch laws. It pledged not to foist its Nazi ideology on the country and made sure that its troops were on their best behaviour. It was all a sham. "In the long run, Germany wanted to annex the Netherlands," said Ten Cate, an expert on Dutch-German relations. "The Germans considered the Dutch Aryans, like the Austrians and the Norwegians."

Within two months of occupying the Netherlands, the Germans imposed a series of escalating restrictions on Dutch Jews. A Jewish Council, led in part by a wealthy diamond merchant, grudgingly co-operated with the Nazis. By 1942, after the first deportation took place, Jews were forced to wear the dreaded yellow Jewish star.

To a degree, Dutch civilians collaborated or co-operated with the Nazis. After the royal family and cabinet ministers fled to London and established a government-in-exile, senior Dutch civil servants, known as secretaries-general, administered the Netherlands in conjunction with the Germans. One of these figures, Hans Max Hirschfeld, a half-Jew, was appointed the Netherlands' ambassador to Indonesia, its former colony, after the war.

The largest political party during the occupation, the Netherlands Union, with a membership of 800,000, espoused a policy of co-operation with the Germans until it was banned. On a more sinister level, 25,000 Dutchmen volunteered for the Dutch Waffen-SS, which participated in atrocities against Jews on the eastern front; the Dutch police helped the Germans round up Jews, and the Dutch Nazi party, under the leadership of Anton Mussert, collaborated with the Nazis.

On the other hand, the now famous sympathy strike in support of Jews in February 1941 organized by the illegal Communist party, as well as a telegram sent by Protestant and Catholic clergymen in 1942 protesting deportations, showed a measure of outrage.

In addition, the Dutch resistance movement belatedly aided Jews, while the Dutch government-in-exile denounced the Germans' anti-Semitic edicts. But in the end, due to fear and the effect of verzuiling – the strict stratification of Dutch society along religious and political lines– the extermination of Dutch Jews was greeted all too often by indifference.

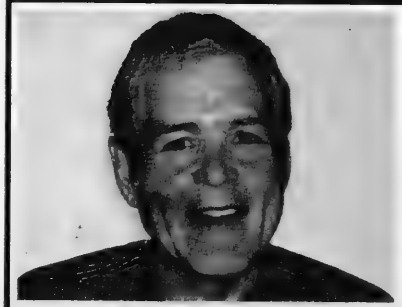
Romspen is the best financial decision I have ever made.



I am wary of investment tips. I have lost money on many. But investing with Romspen is absolutely the best investment decision I ever made. In fact, I have reinvested many times over the years.

Don't confuse Romspen with the scammers. Romspen is not too good to be true. It is a fund of first mortgages in Canada that is managed by experienced and fine people. It works because they know what they are doing. Their excellent reputation with both investors and borrowers is well deserved.

Russian, Canadian vets mark victory over Nazis

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A few months after the city of Leningrad was encircled in September 1941, the food finally ran out.

Desperate for something to eat, the city's residents took to scraping carpenter's glue from furniture and other wooden knick knacks around the house. They made a barely edible mixture out of it known as casein and ate it. They would also take leather goods, such as shoes and belts, and boil them up for whatever nutritional value could be extracted.

It kept them alive, but the hunger was devastating, recalled Boris Gurevich, 77, a survivor of the siege that killed as many as 800,000 Russians. Gurevich, who grew up on Leningrad's Vasilievsky Island, said starvation was everywhere, even in his own family. In January and February 1942, his grandfather and then his grandmother perished from hunger.

Liberation would not come until January 1944, nearly 900 days after the blockade began, and victory over the hated Nazis not until May 1945. On May 7, Russian army veterans, survivors of the Leningrad Blockade and Canadian army veterans will gather to celebrate the 65th anniversary of the defeat of Nazi Germany in a dinner and reception at the National Banquet Hall on Finch Avenue.

Alex Levin, one of the organizers of the event, said proceeds from the dinner will go to the Russian Jewish War Veterans and Holocaust Association, a group that includes about 200 former army personnel.

Though not a soldier, Gurevich, who immigrated to Canada in 2002, will be among the 300 guests at the dinner. His remarkable story is one that many Canadians find hard to understand, he said through an interpreter, Vladimir Kravtsov. "It's too hard for them from their life experience," he said.

Losing his grandparents was bad enough, but those weren't the first losses he'd suffered in the war.

His father, Yosef, an engineer who had been conscripted into a civilian militia unit, had already been killed in action. Only he and his mother, Annina Osipovna Gurevich, survived, thanks to the fact she was a recently graduated doctor who, after coming close to death, recovered enough to work and earn a (sawdust-laced) bread ration of 125 grams per day for her son, 250 for her.

Gurevich and his mother scraped by for close to 900 days, wearing layers of clothing and burning household furniture and books to avoid freezing to death in the bitter Russian winter. They also endured shelling attacks, including an incendiary bomb that destroyed part of the apartment building they lived in.

Living through the Leningrad siege, considered the bloodiest such event in all history, was its own kind of hell and was part of an enormous death toll on the eastern front that boggles the mind.

Canadians – at least those who are history buffs – are well aware of this country's contribution to victory over the Nazis: convoy duty across the Atlantic, the Dieppe raid, fighting in Italy, the Normandy invasion, closing the Falaise Pocket, the battle for the Scheldt estuary and the liberation of the Netherlands, among other battles. But the conflict in eastern Europe dwarfed the war in the west by orders of magnitude, and Jews were right in the thick of it.

Elen Steinberg Brodie, one of the organizers of the evening event, said an estimated "500,000 Russian Jews fought in the war, and almost nobody knows it." More than 250,000 of them were killed. (Amateur historian Dan Carlin in his podcast, Ghosts of the Ostfront, points out that the Soviets lost 10,000 men a day on the central front alone during the summer of 1941, attesting to the enormous scale of the conflict in the east.)

Remembering May 7

Brodie, whose grandfather, Maj. Lazer Liverant, died fighting at Stalingrad, said a few hundred Russian army veterans are expected at the banquet, all likely in uniform with their chests bedecked with medals. These survivors point to a reality little appreciated in the West, that "where Jews could fight back, they did."

"When I tell people that half a million Russian Jews were conscripted into the army and fought in the war, they don't know that and they are shocked," said Brodie. "The perception is that all perished in the Holocaust."

Brodie wants "to capture people's stories and include them as part of a new Jewish museum in Toronto and make sure they are not forgotten."

Gurevich certainly hasn't forgotten. When his grandparents died, he and his mother were so weak "we couldn't get up," he said. Luckily, a friend serving at the front line visited them on leave and brought enough food to keep them alive. When his mother got stronger, she began working.

On the day the siege ended, "there was a joyful commotion. Everybody embraced each other. We were very happy about it," Gurevich said. What followed was a long period of reconstruction and, of course, better food. But it wasn't until 18 months later that "food returned to normal."

Since then, Gurevich, a retired mining engineer, "never had leftovers thrown into the garbage. [I] never threw food away up to now."

Walk with Israel enthusiasts tap their creative side

Annual event takes to the streets of Toronto on Sunday, May 30th

By Daniel Horowitz

When it comes to raising funds for UJA's upcoming 2010 Walk with Israel, members of Toronto's Jewish community are using creative, out-of-the-box thinking to help the children of Bat Yam.

Funds raised by the 42nd annual Walk with Israel presented by Metropia – the largest one-day Israel solidarity walk in the Diaspora – will help Bat Yam's young children, with proceeds being allocated to United Israel Appeal Canada for which authorized organizations will deliver services.

Located just south of Tel Aviv, Bat Yam has historically faced a number of challenges including unemployment, housing conditions and the educational system. The city is also home to a high population of Ethiopian immigrants striving to integrate into Israeli society. UJA assistance, through UIA, is literally transforming Bat Yam's educational and social situation.

The Walk kick-off party, held at Coronation Park – across from the CNE's Princes' Gates and sponsored by Horizons Betapro ETFs - will begin at 9 am, with the Walk starting at 10 am, rain or shine.

This year's Walk will again be chaired by the dynamic husband and wife team of Bruce and Lianne Leboff.

The Walk with Israel ends with the RioCan Festival, which starts at 11:30 am at The Direct Energy Centre, Exhibition Place, and features carnival rides and games; the Spin Master Play Zone, a petting zoo; the Teen Zone with Guitar Hero; The IBI Group Israeli Art Centre; The Gluskin Sheff Kosher Barbecue, and much more.

For one Toronto family, the Walk with Israel is not only a chance to help the people of Israel, it's also the perfect opportunity to pay tribute to a loved one who recently passed away.

"My father, Ernie Weiss, devoted his life to volunteer work and tzedakah and was the leader of our family on the Walk with Israel each year. He never missed it," explained Marilyn Sinclair, one of Ernie's four daughters. "A few years ago, we officially named our group Team Ernie."

Ernie, a Holocaust survivor, educator and ardent Zionist, had tears in his eyes every year when he saw Toronto's streets replete with Israeli flags, T-shirts, and passionate, enthusiastic youth participating in the Walk. He said it was always one of the happiest events of the year for him.

In 2008, Ernie went on the March of the Living as a Survivor and leader. From that point forward, he wore his March of the Living jacket on the Walk and loved that dozens of people would constantly stop to speak to him.

Unfortunately, Ernie passed away on January 7, 2010, but Team Ernie will continue as his legacy. Anyone who would like to walk in Ernie's memory can join the team, and Marilyn hopes that her friends and family will raise a significant amount of money, while having a great time.

When Shelly Markel was on her way to the grocery store recently, she may have wondered why her three children insisted that she pick up what seemed like an exorbitant amount of lemonade. The motives of her kids, Michal, 9, Ari, 6 and Roni, 3 soon became apparent.

"My husband Ian and I have been participating in the Walk with Israel since Michal was born, and whenever we had another addition, we were always thrilled to add to the Walk's attendance," said Shelly. "All three of my kids love the Walk and wanted to do something themselves to raise money for the children of Bat Yam."

So, on a warm, sunny April weekend, the kids opened a lemonade stand outside their Bathurst and Eglinton area home, raising over a hundred dollars in the process, and well over $1,300 from pledges, as well.

"We knew that we wanted to do something to raise money for Israel, and we figured that everyone would like a nice cold cup of lemonade," said Michal, a Grade 4 Robbins Hebrew Academy (formerly USDS) student.

"At first, I didn't know that there was anything we could do to help poor kids in Israel, but, through the Walk with Israel, we could do something really good. I've been going to the Walk for a long time; I love seeing all my friends there, and I really love the RioCan Festival, too. I learned about tzedakah when I was really young from my Bubbie, so it's nice to do what I learned to help others."

Ari, who as the "voice" of the lemonade stand, implored neighbours and passing motorists to sample their wares, has also made good use of his new allowance.

"I just started getting an allowance of three dollars," enthused the Grade 1 student at the Robbins Hebrew Academy. "One dollar of that is for me to spend, another goes into a bank account, and the third dollar goes to tzedakah. I really like helping others; it feels good and it's fun."

For the youngest member of this fundraising troika, Roni, her role in this fundraising initiative was clearly a success. "I liked yelling, 'lemonade,'" she said.

From the mouths of babes. It just shows that you're never too young to start helping others.

"They learn about tzedakah and other Jewish values at school, but to see them take those life lessons from theory and to use them is truly heartwarming. We were thrilled with the response from neighbours, friends and even complete strangers who were touched by the kids' enthusiasm and delighted to support the cause."

Israel economic mission presents trade awards

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israel doesn't confer knighthoods or award civilian medals, so instead the Israel Economic Mission and the Consulate General will present the Israel Trade Awards to a handful of corporations and individuals for advancing trade and investment between Canada and Israel.

The awards ceremony will be held about two weeks before Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty leads a trade delegation to the Jewish state.

"It was high time we held such an event," said Jonathan Levy, Israel's consul for economic affairs and trade commissioner. "Looking at the timing, we took a number of issues into consideration. We wanted it to be on the 60th year of diplomatic relations between Canada and Israel and as a buildup event to the visit of the premier and the business delegation."

Jonathan Levy

The 2009 Israeli Trade Awards will be presented to Given Imaging, Radware, Solemates Inc. and the Blackberry Partners Fund. In addition, a special award will be presented to businessman and philanthropist Leslie Dan "for a lifetime contribution for promoting bilateral trade" and to Erica Segal of Julie M. Gallery, for presenting Israeli art.

Levy said Given Imaging is famous for its pill-sized camera that, when swallowed, is used to diagnose digestive system maladies. Radware is a leading manufacturer of telecommunications equipment, while Solemates distributes Naot footwear in Canada.

The Blackberry Partners Fund, which is affiliated with Research in Motion and RBC, invests in cutting-edge technologies, Levy said.

The award recipients "are those companies in Canada that have been highly successful in bringing products or solutions from Israel," he added.

Since the Canada-Israel free trade agreement was concluded 10 years ago, the bilateral trade relationship has expanded at close to 10 per cent per year. In 2000, two-way trade reached $925 million, while in 2009, that figure jumped to $1.4 billion. The best year for trade was 2008, with $1.8 billion in products and services changing hands.

Last year's numbers were down due to the worldwide economic downturn, but Levy is confident 2010 will mark a recovery.

The bulk of Israeli exports are in the high-tech field, Levy said. "People use Israeli products and technology without even knowing it."

BlackBerry devices contain an Israeli-made chip, while Pentium and Core 2 computer chips were developed in Israel, as was software that runs voicemail, instant messaging and cellphone billing, he said.

Feeding the poorest of the poor — in Israel

— Hazon Yeshaya serves more than 14,000 —

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Abraham Israel, founder and director of Israel's largest soup kitchen – Hazon Yeshaya Humanitarian Network – knows what it means to be poor and hungry.

As a 10-year-old child in 1960, he fled with his parents and sister from his native Egypt to France, where the family spent almost four years in Paris before emigrating to Brooklyn, N.Y.

"We ended up surviving in soup kitchens for 3 1/2 years," he told The CJN during a recent visit to Toronto to meet with supporters.

Canadian Friends of Hazon Yeshaya has had a presence here for five years. The organization is planning a large gala event for March 2011, and a smaller dinner for sponsors next month, on June 9.

"I remember having torn clothes, and holes in my shoes," said Israel. "It was embarrassing, but it wasn't the end of the world. Thank God there were wonderful people there who would feed us every day. I always dreamt of paying back this favour."

Israel, now a retired shoe importer who made aliyah when he retired, started his first soup kitchen after a chance meeting in 1997 with a young woman who had multiple sclerosis.

Because she wasn't feeling well, he accompanied her home and saw that her one-room apartment was bare, with broken windows, a leaky faucet, and no electricity or refrigerator.

Shocked, he asked her what she was going to eat that day, and if she didn't receive money from the government. Her answer, he recalls, was that she would have a yogurt, and that, yes, she received a stipend, but that the money went for her medication.

Then he asked if she knew anyone else living in similar conditions. She referred him to neighbours across the hall, and before long he knew of 17 people who needed help.

"It's all led by the Almighty," said Israel, an accountant by training who also has rabbinic smichah. He hired an elderly woman to cook, and opened a storefront operation where he provided a daily meal to the group of 17.

Today his organization – named in memory of his late father – serves more than 14,000 people, providing daily meals as well as children's programs, dental care including implants, and vocational training that Israel said has a success rate of 85 per cent (referring to students who find jobs).

"We're seeing some success in this, that it stops the cycle of poverty. Therefore, we're very excited, and we're expanding it."

Abraham Israel

About a third of those who receive the meals are Holocaust survivors. There are also some Arab clients, including 350 children in East Jerusalem who receive the same kosher meals as other clients, at their school.

Given Israel's business background and training as an accountant, he runs his non-profit organization "in a most businesslike manner," he said.

The organization has an annual budget of $12 million, and only three per cent goes to overhead, a rate "unheard of in the non-profit world," Israel said.

In part, he explained, the overhead is kept down by the small staff – seven employees in all – and the large number of volunteers, including some visitors from overseas, who do everything from cutting vegetables to serving or delivering meals.

As well, Israel noted, "clients" or "customers" are screened to make sure they meet government criteria for poverty. "We work hand in hand with government and the municipalities, and we only service 'Status A,' the lowest poverty level."

Israel said that, despite well-publicized bureaucratic delays in Israel, there is a document his clients can obtain easily within 24 hours, and it is required within that time frame if they don't have the documentation the organization requests.

As well, he insists on maintaining the dignity of those who use the services. "I just let go of a good volunteer who yelled back at a client."

Hazon Yeshaya provides meals 365 days a year. On Passover, its kitchens are kashered overnight.

"We take it very seriously. These are Status A people. We can't skip a day."

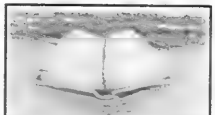
Jewish Life

No matter what you do, you'll always be Jewish

By RABBI AVROHOM JACKS

A Jewish couple – the man born in America, the woman in Europe – is vacationing. One night, all the hotels where they try to register are fully occupied. The only hotel with vacancies is restricted – it won't accept Jews.

The man says, "When we check, in let me do the talking. You don't say a word, because the moment that you open your mouth, they will know that you are a Jew."



Rabbinic Reflections

The woman agrees to the plan, and they register without a hitch.

The next morning, the woman goes down to the pool.

She dives in, but the water is very cold. The shock of the icy water causes her to call out "Oy vey!"

Suddenly, she sees everyone around the pool staring at her. "Vatever dat means" she adds.

American banker Otto Kahn was Jewish by birth, but he had converted to Christianity. He was once walking with a hunchback friend when they passed a synagogue. "You know I used to be a Jew," Kahn said.

"And I used to be a hunchback," his companion replied.

According to Judaism, no matter how a Jew conducts his or her life, if they were born Jewish, that's the way they remain. Circumstances may force us to forget that most important part of our being, but ultimately it will re-surface.

In spiritual terms, we always carry around our thick Yiddish accents. We can no more deny our Jewish essence than a hunchback can deny his deformity.

On the upcoming festival of Shavuot, we commemorate the fact that God gave us the 10 Commandments and together with them, the entire Torah.

The Ten Commandments were carved in stone tablets.

A letter carved into stone can get covered over with dirt over many years. The dirt can so cover the letters as to make them illegible. However, the letters are still there.

All we need to do is blow away the dirt to reveal them.

Similarly the Jewish soul is always present and always ready to burst forth into a powerful blaze, even if occasionally it is reduced to a small fire.

This idea is beautifully illustrated by the following meaningful story.

In Poland, survivors who tried to return to their former homes were often met with deadly hostility. A certain Jew told how, after liberation, he clandestinely led a group of 200 survivors to freedom.

The Polish authorities wouldn't readily grant their Jewish citizens exit permits. In order to escape from Poland, the 200 had to pose as Greek Jews seeking repatriation to Greece. Our friend instructed this ragged group not to speak Yiddish, Polish, Russian or any other regional language, lest they reveal their true identities.

Though none of them spoke Greek, the group's leader did speak a Sephardi Hebrew, which is often spoken by Greek Jews.

Misled by the leader's language, the Polish military at the Czechoslovakia rail terminal was eager to have the group of Greeks exit.

When they reached Bratislavia in Czechoslovakia, they were stopped by Russian troops.

An officer pointed to one of the members of the group and began questioning him in Russian.

The man became frightened, since he did not speak Greek or anything that sounded foreign.

However, he was familiar with the Hebrew prayer book.

Hoping to fool the Russian officer, he looked him in the eye and spoke the opening words of the Shabbat prayer Yekum Purkan Min Shamaya, Which means "May salvation come from heaven."

The Russian officer continued the prayer, "Chinah vechisdah vrachamim" – "With grace, kindness and mercy."

The officer then explained that he, too, was a Polish Jew forced into the Russian army. He concluded by saying in Yiddish "Perhaps someday we will meet in Israel."

Have a wonderful Yom Tov!

On reaching 90

I consider myself fortunate having reached 90 years relatively intact in body and mind. It is hard to realize that when Moses was my age, he had already led the Children of Israel through the wilderness for 10 years.

In a restaurant these days when my waiter asks, "How is it so far?" I unfailingly respond, "So far, so good." In a similar fashion when my friends inquire, "How are you doing? or, "How is life treating you?" etc., I reward them with the same formula, "So far, so good."

Bernard Baskin

Of course, old age can be frightening. Shakespeare, who was a keen and realistic observer of the human condition, depicted old age as second childishness and mere oblivion, sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything.

Of course he knew nothing about dental implants, hearing aids, cataract operations, bypass procedures – or the magical power and range of our modern pharmacopoeia, from Viagra to Lipitor.

Old folks almost everywhere are considered a burden. Instead of facing up to the problem, we pretend that it does not exist. We devote a considerable proportion of our natural resources to perpetuate a deception that truly deceives no one, the lie that we are all eternally young.

As Hamlet said, holding in his hands a skull, "To this favour we must all come." The reality of our lives is that as time goes on, we grow older, and if we cannot find meaning and value in our later years, I think we betray the circumstance that our earlier years were also empty.

Life has been compared to a camel – you can make it do anything but back up. A Hollywood celebrity confided that the secret to staying young is to live honestly, eat slowly and lie about your age.

Clearly, as author Ashley Montagu wrote, "the trick to life is to die young as late as possible." When he was 93, Pablo Casals, the famous cellist, wrote: "If you continue to work and absorb the beauty in the world about you, you find that age does not necessarily mean getting old. At least not in the ordinary sense. I feel many things more intensely than ever before, and for me life grows more fascinating... I do not think a single day passes by in my life in which I fail to look with fresh amazement at the miracle of nature. It is there on every side."

The irrepressible filmmaker Woody Allen proclaimed: "I don't want to achieve immortality through my work. I want to achieve immortality through not dying. I don't want to live on in the hearts of my countrymen. I would rather live on in my apartment."

Ultimately, if we are wise we will understand that the world is a temporary home; we are renters, not owners. Once a group of American visitors went to visit a European sage. With great anticipation, they were ushered into his study. There they saw a frail man sitting at a rickety desk on which sat a few books. In surprise, one of the visitors blurted out, "Master, where are all your possessions?" He smiled and replied, "Where are all of yours?" The man answered: "We have very few possessions with us. After all, we are just passing through." He nodded and said, "Me, too."

One waiter among the many who inquired about my meal reminded me that dessert was still to come. At my stage in life, I remain unconvinced. Surely, the main course of my years was enough. But an unheralded spirit whispers in my ear, "Try the chocolate cheesecake."

Jewish Life

We need Torah, and it needs us

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

As Jews around the world prepare for the annual Shavuot festival, marking the giving of the Torah at Mount Sinai, it's worth considering the paradoxical legacy of global Torah study.

In Israel, many haredim continue to pursue Torah learning as their exclusive way of life, sacrificing material comfort to the extent that they have become a serious "economic underclass." In the words of Bar-Ilan University professor Noah Efron, "ultra-Orthodox males probably spend more time in formal study than any other class of humans ever has in the history of the planet. But small stipends do not easily support large families... as each generation exceeds the poverty of the last. Families of a dozen live in 600-square-foot apartments."

Efron, among others, argues that such a situation, in which the secular world is utterly shunned and hence necessary life skills to create economic opportunity are never incorporated, may not be sustainable for much longer: "Torah study thrives and children go to school in thrice-patched pants with an ache in their belly. Something has to give."

It's strange to compare this picture with that of many other contemporary Jews, for whom Torah study is an endeavour that takes place on a distant planet, one they have neither the inclination nor the inspiration to visit. Seen as an archaic remnant of a prehistoric culture, Torah is a curiosity at best, and at worst, an oppressive reminder of the days before science "enlightened" us all. In this version, only the profane is holy.

It seems difficult in the landscape of these polar opposites to recall that Judaism and Torah study is the inheritance of the entire Jewish people. The late philosopher Emmanuel Levinas suggests that this sentiment isn't just a canard used by Jewish educators, but rather a profound truth about what Torah really means.

In his seminal essay Revelation in the Jewish Tradition, Levinas writes that the Revelation calls to that which is singular in each of us, "as if every person, through his uniqueness, were the guarantee of the revelation of a unique aspect of truth, and some of its points would never have been revealed if some people had been absent from mankind."

As much as we need Jewish texts to enrich us, they need each of us to unlock some dimension that would have remained hidden, like a house with an infinite number of doors requiring each of us to open them with our own set of keys.

When a teacher asks a student to comment on how they understand a Torah text, it would be a a grave error to think that this is just a pro forma exercise and that all of the "real" meanings of Torah are already spoken for in thousands of years of dense commentary. Rather, the business of each person coming to own the Torah text, to fuse our particular sensibilities with the ancient and eternal words, creates a synthesis and hence an illumination that has been waiting for millenia for the student to be born, grow up and add their voice to Torah.

Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook used to divide reality into "that which is holy and that which is not yet holy." The chosen poverty of haredim implies a lack of complete clarity about how to fuse all of the parts of God's world. Another kind of poverty, the lack of a generation of non-literate Jews, awaits remediation.

The original Top Ten list

It's the original Top Ten list.

On Wednesday, May 19, Aseret Hadibrot, the Ten Commandments, will be read from the Torah to mark the first day of Shavuot. Aside from being fundamental to Judaism, those commandments have influenced civilization and worked themselves into all aspects of western culture. Today, 10 (or so) sites for the Ten Commandments.

I. The original text(s)

You can read the Ten Commandments in Exodus 20:1. [bit.ly/aseret1] Actually, the Ten Commandments appear twice in the Torah, the second time with some variations, in Deuteronomy 5:5. [bit.ly/aseret3]

II. Counting the Commandments

In the Torah, the Commandments aren't actually numbered. According to Yitzchak Etshalom, that has been a source of controversy in Judaism. "Where does number 1 end, where does number 2 end, etc.?" Rabbi Etshalom presents three different numbering schemes. [bit.ly/aseret4]

III. Their special significance

If the Ten Commandments are raised to a unique status, what does that say about the status of the rest of the Torah? The essay Special Treatment for the Ten Commandments examines this question and related debates over whether it's proper for the congregation to stand while the Ten Commandments are recited, and even whether the tablets should be displayed inside the synagogue. [bit.ly/aseret17]

IV. The tablets

Speaking of which, Rabbi Anchelle Perl is happy to burst a misconception. We are all familiar with those iconic tablets, square on the bottom, round on the top. Not quite, says Rabbi Perl. He quotes the Talmud to argue that the tablets were also square on top. He says Judaism has a responsibility to depict accurately one of its most important symbols. [bit.ly/aseret26]

V. In song

Actually, in chant. You can listen to the Aseret Hadibrot, thanks to Cantor David Goldstein of North Shore Congregation Israel of Glencoe, Ill. [bit.ly/aseret45]

VI. The night before

One popular Shavuot tradition is to stay up and learn throughout the first night of the holiday in anticipation of the giving of the Torah, which is commemorated in the morning. The Union of American Hebrew Congregations has created a detailed booklet for the Tikkun Leyl Shavuot evening titled Aseret Hadibrot: Illuminating the Ten Commandments. [bit.ly/aseret37]

VII. For kids

The Jewish Theological Seminary site has a large poster celebrating the giving of the Torah that kids can print out and colour. [bit.ly/aseret38]

VIII. In the courts

The Ten Commandments are a common adornment to many synagogues. But when displayed in U.S. schools, government buildings and courthouses, controversy has been common because of the separation of church and state. This site provides links to some of the more famous debates. [bit.ly/aseret40]

IX. The movie

There have been several screen adaptations, but when you talk about the movie, you must be referring to Cecil B. DeMille's 1956 epic with Charleton Heston and Yul Brynner. [bit.ly /aseret44]

X. In popular culture

The Ten Commandments have not only become central to Judaism but they've also woven themselves into popular culture. Many sites even have lists of "new" commandments, some sensible, some sublime, some ridiculous, including the 10 commandments of breastfeeding: "You shall not wean your children for the sake of convenience." [bit.ly/aseret41]

Of square dancing: "Thou shalt take care that the words of thy mouth are not scented with garlic or beer." [bit.ly/aseret42]

Of sane living: "Strike a balance between work and play. Nobody ever said on their death bed, 'I wish I had spent more time in the office.'" [bit.ly/aseret43]

Have a very happy holiday.

Criticism key to democracy, New Israel Fund president says

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Maintaining human rights and allowing expressions of protest are crucial if Israel is to remain a democratic country, New Israel Fund (NIF) president Naomi Chazan emphasized at Congregation Darchei Noam May 9.

Having grown up in Israel, she said her views stem from her deep understanding of the Israeli declaration of independence, which she said talks about the essential values of the state, including "equality for all citizens regardless of race, nationality, gender or religion, extending a hand of peace to our neighbours."

> 'If it's wrong, it's got to be stopped'

The former deputy speaker of the Israeli Knesset told the audience of some 250 her fear is that Israel, in an attempt to protect its Jewish identity, is marginalizing others, particularly Israeli Arabs.

"Democracy is measured by how [the people] treat their minorities," she said, speaking with an obvious sadness in her voice as she explained examples such as the difference in the level of funding for Israeli-Arab schools compared to primarily Jewish ones.

She also fights for gender equality, she said, explaining that in some areas of the country, women must enter buses from the back while men sit in the front.

"If it's wrong, it's got to be stopped," she said, describing herself as the mother of civil society in Israel.

About 15 protesters stood outside the entrance to the synagogue before the talk, distributing information on the NIF. Most of them were from the Jewish Defence League (JDL), a group that describes its goal as protecting Jews from anti-Semitism.

Meir Weinstein, JDL Canada's national director, told The CJN the goal of the protest was to make sure people understand what the NIF is about.

One issue, he said, is its funding of groups who describe the Israel Defence Forces as war criminals.

"Jews have to be united, and for Jews to start criticizing Israel, going as far as calling the IDF a war criminal organization is certainly not helpful to the cause of Israel," he said.

Chazan joked that she felt at home as soon as she saw the demonstrators, though she insisted that she strongly supports their right to protest, particularly because it shows they care.

In the past months, Chazan's views have come under fire, particularly those regarding Operation Cast Lead, Israel's offensive in Gaza December 2008 to January 2009.

Much of this criticism is related to the Goldstone report, a UN investigation into alleged Israeli human rights violations during the war in Gaza. In the report, several NIF grantees criticized Israel's actions.

However, Chazan stressed that the NIF has nothing to do with the Goldstone report.

Earlier this year, her opponents distributed and posted large signs and billboards depicting Chazan with a horn coming from her forehead, which she explained as playing on the fact that the Hebrew words for horn and fund are homonyms.

Many of her opponents also used protests to show their discontent with the NIF's actions.

Her admission that during the offensive she had signed a petition calling the operation a "slaughter" of Palestinians sparked the most obvious disagreement in the audience, with people booing at her words.

In general, however, the audience seemed attentive, sometimes applauding but mostly listening silently, though some people could be heard uttering disagreements under their breath.

Rabbi Eva Goldfinger of the Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism said in an interview after the talk that she has been supporting the NIF since its inception. She said she supports about 80 per cent of its views, disagreeing mostly with its granting funds to what she called violent Palestinian groups.

They should support pro-Palestinian groups, she said, but must draw the line when the groups begin to promote violence.

She described Chazan as very warm, with a "listening voice," despite sometimes avoiding fully answering the questions, such as when one man asked for an explanation as to why the NIF supports certain groups.

However, Rabbi Goldfinger said this seemed to come from an effort to maintain a peaceful environment.

Despite disagreeing with some of the grantees, she said she supports the right to present varying opinions.

"It's because we don't listen to each other that we are angry," she said.

Chazan also stressed the importance of listening to opinions that may be contrary to public opinion.

She said a recent study showed that 79 per cent of the books on the reading lists for political science courses at Israeli universities criticize Israel.

While some people deem this inappropriate, she argued this critical thinking is the purpose of universities.

One audience member was a woman from Syria who thanked Chazan for her actions, stressing that it is her type of views that are key to creating peace.

Chazan responded that she dreams of one day being able to drive from her home in Israel to have lunch in Syria. However, she emphasized that in order for peace to come, Israel must treat democracy as a garden with a need for constant care.

"Anybody who is concerned about Israel's existence must first and foremost protect Israel's democracy," she said to an applauding audience, describing this as the heart of her lecture. "If we lose our democratic character, we will not survive."

El Al launches one-stop website

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

El Al Israel Airlines unveiled a new website last week that lets travellers book "dream vacations" on their own while permitting travel agents to access low-cost packages from the airline's inventory.

"We are strengthening our commitment and adding products… to facilitate travel," said Dina Kutner, general manager of El Al's Canadian office.

"As of today, a passenger can in five easy steps book a trip," said Aviva Lavi, marketing manager for El Al Tourism, the airline's travel package division.

Travellers comfortable on the Internet now have the tools to arrange all aspects of their trip, including air, hotel, tours and land transportation. The web program is "quick, easy and very user friendly," the Tel Aviv-based Lavi said in a news conference that introduced the site to travel writers and tour operators.

In a pitch to travel agents taking part, Kutner and Lavi said the website "enhances the tools" available for those in the industry who are packaging a vacation for clients. Lavi noted some agents are expected to direct their clients to it to provide them with information about a trip to Israel. However, six agents at the media event were skeptical that they would ever use the web page for that purpose.

"We're going to lose business if we show the client this website," said one agent. "Why would they need a travel agent?"

"You would never send anybody to this website," said another agent, who didn't want her name used. "They phone travel agents for our expertise and knowledge."

"Why send them to this website? So they can tell me Israel is a beautiful country when they get back?" asked a third agent.

Kutner said the site would be most useful for agents in communities that don't see a lot of travel to Israel. "It's more geared for agents in [cities such as] Moose Jaw, [Sask.], who don't know Israeli hotels and tours," she said.

However, members of the travel industry in Toronto can benefit from the site in other ways, she told The CJN. Sometimes El Al Tourism might have better deals on hotels than the agents, who can book online and still get a commission.

Kutner said El Al will add a fourth non-stop flight from Toronto to Tel Aviv from June 21 to Sept. 5 for the busy summer travel season, reverting to a three-flight-a-week schedule afterward.

Meanwhile, Oded Grofman, Israel Government Tourism Office consul and director for Canada, said Israel may set a new record for tourism in 2010, with 3.2 million visitors expected, including 78,000 Canadian passport-holders.

Seventy-three thousand Canadians visited Israel in 2008, a record year, but that number declined in 2009 to 62,000, owing largely to the economic downturn. Expectations for another record in 2010 are based in part on data accumulated so far. Some 6,000 Canadians visited Israel in March alone, "the best March ever," Grofman said.

Most are part of organized trips that include a full package of air, hotels and tours and as many as 75 per cent are Christians, particularly religious pilgrims, he added.

El Al's new English language website is at http://www.elal.co.il/ELAL/English/States/General.

Maimonides may have influenced Freud, author says

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

"Everything new must have its roots in what was before," wrote Sigmund Freud, the father of psychoanalysis.

But even psychoanalysis itself may have ancient roots, according to psychologist David Weiss, who addressed a group of professionals and laypeople at a May 3 Jewish Health Alliance event at Pine Villa.

Freud's approach closely parallels writings of the 12th-century physician and teacher Maimonides. While Maimonides wouldn't be familiar with some of the terms used by Freud and his followers – such as "unconscious," "intellect" or "psyche" – he probably knew the concepts well, calling them "imagination," "soul" or even "angel."

Young Maimonides

Weiss' recent book, Maimonides' Cure of Souls: Medieval Precursor of Psychoanalysis, co-written with Dan Merkur and the late David Bakan, explores Maimonides' belief that "the improvement of moral qualities is brought about by the healing of the soul and its activities."

Maimonides is widely appreciated as a codifier of Jewish law, but his psychological writings are often overlooked.

He believed "illnesses of the soul" took away a person's free choice, causing them to lose their grounding in the rational world. "He was way ahead of his time," Weiss said.

Today, what Maimonides thought of as loss of free choice is called "addiction" or "thought disorder," Weiss added.

Maimonides believed that imagination by itself – without a solid grounding in rationality – could lead to distortion, disturbance or even death.

And for Maimonides as well as for Freud, Weiss hinted, that disturbance was frequently sexual.

Sigmund Freud

"Diving down into secrets" is how Maimonides might have described the process of psychotherapy. The "talking cure," whether on a couch in Vienna or the Royal Court of Saladin in Egypt, can explore a person's innermost being with the goal of restoring control and the ability to make rational choices.

Weiss, a rabbi and Toronto business psychologist who holds degrees from York University, Yeshiva University and Columbia University, says many of Maimonides' beliefs closely foreshadow the Freudian model of psychoanalysis.

Many convergences are unique and specific enough to strongly suggest that Freud was exhuming Maimonides for a new age and audience.

Both Freud and Maimonides associated mental illness with involuntary inhibition, and saw the therapeutic role as helping individuals regain freedom. Both also saw recovering lost understanding as a key to therapy. And Maimonides' parsing of the biblical narrative of Jacob's dream, according to Weiss, radically presages Freud's own emphasis on dream analysis.

Maimonides' views on Jewish law differ from many early thinkers. Rather than taking away free will, said Weiss, he saw Jewish law as a good way to live, with little grounding in the afterlife.

"The primary benefit of doing good deeds is what it will do to you," and the drawback of sin is "what it will do to you as a human being," Weiss said.

To today's Jewish community, and to the world of psychology, Maimonides might emphasize that "Jewish law is an entry requirement," but that character development must exist above merely following Jewish law in order to truly fulfil the individual's soul, Weiss said.

Freud may have hidden his connection with any sort of Jewish teachings to lend credibility to psychoanalysis and prevent it from being regarded as a "Jewish science."

Yet he was at least passingly familiar with some ideas of Maimonides from his upbringing, since his father was a former Chassid. As well, Maimonides' writings were available in German, and influential meetings between Freud and the Chief Rabbi of Geneva, Alexandre Safran, along with scholars such as Franz Brentano, must have at least touched on Maimonides' therapeutic teachings, Weiss noted.

Maimonides' own path into a medical career may have begun in personal tragedy: the death at sea of his merchant younger brother. Out of his own deep depression, he arrived at his decision to study the medical sciences.

"I don't think we can ignore the connection with his brother's death," Weiss said.

Weiss, who will be speaking on Maimonides again at the all-night Tikkun Leil Shavuot at the Miles Nadal JCC on May 18, says the book, which includes writings by his own mentor, the late York University professor David Bakan, represents a promise "to [Bakan] and to the world" to cast new light on the Jewish origins of Freud's theories.

The Jewish Health Alliance (http://jewishhealthalliance.com) was founded about 10 years ago to promote "the idea that Jewish teachings have application in the healing arts," said founding member Annette Poizner. Non-Jewish colleagues are invited to participate and share in spreading Jewish wisdom throughout the healing professions.

Traditional teachings often offer a depth that's sometimes lacking in the modern age, as with Maimonides, who, said Weiss, "didn't separate the notion of a physician for the body and a physician for the psyche."

Each person has physical potential and emotional potential, and he believed that "the physician's task is treating them all," Weiss said.

While today we have separate doctors for mind and body, he added, Maimonides believed he couldn't treat one without the other. "He'd say he's a doctor to heal the soul."

Toronto shul to feature award-winning composer

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Award-winning composer Marvin Hamlisch was in the audience when Cantor Alex Stein performed at a cantorial concert in San Diego in 2006.

Marvin Hamlisch, left, and Cantor Alex Stein

They spoke at a reception after the concert, and as Stein – now cantor at Toronto's Adath Israel Congregation – puts it, "we put a partnership together," involving a concert by Hamlisch and three cantors.

The following year, Stein, a native of Sydney, Australia, brought Hamlisch to Calgary for a Broadway-style "Three Cantors" performance with the Calgary Philharmonic Orchestra at the city's Beth Tzedec Congregation, where Stein was serving at the time.

Since then, they have taken the concert to Sydney and Vancouver. They will return to Vancouver's Orpheum Theatre June 23.

On May 27, Hamlisch will perform at Toronto's Adath Israel with Stein only. Hamlisch was here in 2008 to perform at Beth Tzedec Congregation with Cantor Simon Spiro, but told The CJN he isn't making synagogue appearances his new profession.

For the upcoming Toronto Show, Broadway from the Bimah, Stein said that "people can look forward to an evening of showtunes and Jewish Broadway music that they would never hear in a synagogue... it's an eclectic night."

Hamlisch, reached by phone in a New York rehearsal room where he was working on a Broadway show, said that when he first heard Stein, he enjoyed his voice and his energy.

As well, he said, he "kind of liked the idea of a concert where three cantors get together and do something that can be a lot of fun, that's not as clouded in mournful and religious overtones, which is sometimes what you think cantors do. There's something nice about having cantors who sing for the joy of it."

Hamlisch – who among other projects is working on a Broadway version of Queen of the Stardust Ballroom, which is now "deep in rehearsal" – believes music has the power to make people laugh and cry, and heighten emotions, and that musicians are "the best ambassadors" for a country. He cited as an example conductor Daniel Barenboim, who founded an Israeli-Arab orchestra.

Tickets for Broadway from the Bimah are available at 416-635-5340.

Camp Moshava marks 75 years with Israel reunion

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Old friends reunited in Israel last month to celebrate 75 years of Camp Moshava, a Zionist overnight camp with locations throughout North America.

More than 2,000 former campers, staff and their families gathered on Yom Ha'atzmaut at the Naot Kedumin Nature Reserve near the city of Modi'in.

"It was exciting to see people who I haven't seen in years," said Dov Gilor, a volunteer at the reunion and a former head of the Moshava camp in Gelatt, Penn., which closed in 1962.

Bnei Akiva, an Orthodox Zionist youth movement, runs the camps, including the Canadian one in Ennismore, Ont., which celebrated its 50th anniversary at the reunion.

Avraham Weiss, who went to the Canadian location in 1966, said that he ran into people he knew from outside of camp at the reunion, and thanks to the event, learned that they had a Moshava background.

The day consisted of lectures, nature walks, food and inflatable toys for the children.

Despite the many activities available, the real treat was re-connecting with old friends after many years, Gilor said.

"Most of the time, the people who actually were at Moshava were sitting around talking to their friends," he said.

Robbie Sassoon, one of the organizers of the event, works for Moshava on special alumni projects and has been a part of the organization, particularly with the Indian Orchard camp in Pennsylvania, for the past 25 years.

He said although he hadn't lost touch with too many old camp friends, it was especially nice to reinforce the idea of bringing people to Israel.

Weiss agreed, noting that his time at camp brought him into the world of Zionism, which played a major role in his decision to move to Israel.

Until recently, people didn't realize the significant educational influence of Jewish camps, he said, adding that the effect of camp has been shown to be sometimes greater than formal Jewish education.

"There's a lot of education happening," he said. "You go away with a very, very intense experience."

About 1,000 of the participants were alumni, primarily former campers and participants in Moshava's leadership courses. The rest were their children and grandchildren.

Jewish companies also made presentations, including one by Machon Tzomet that demonstrated new technology designed to make it easier to follow some of the rules of Shabbat, such as halachic wheelchairs.

Gilor said he was pleased with the number of participants, especially considering that the event was on Israel's Independence Day, when there are many other celebrations all over the country.

However, Sassoon said there couldn't have been a better day to hold the reunion, since the camp's promotion of a love for Israel is what brought so many of the alumni to Israel.

"It just really shows solidarity with Israel," Gilor said.

TEMPLE HAR ZION

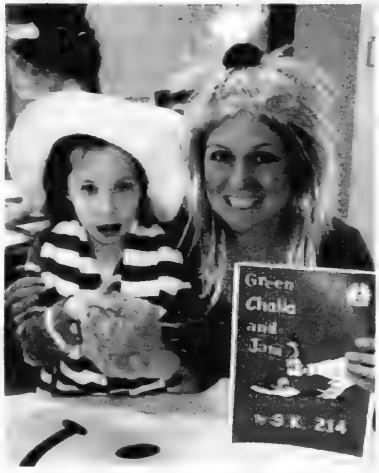
Becky Friedman, a student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Wallenberg campus, recently returned from Jerusalem, where she placed fourth in the National Bible Contest of the World Zionist Organization, out of thousands of students from Israel and the Diaspora. She was the top competitor among the Diaspora entrants. Alex Maged, a Tanenbaum-CHAT student, and Harry Cape, an independent entrant from Montreal, also took part in the competition in Israel, having qualified in last year's contest sponsored in Canada by the Jewish National Fund of Canada, the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre in Montreal, and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and its Centre for Jewish Education.

Class Acts



GREEN CHALLAH AND JAM: Associated Hebrew Schools' senior kindergarten students enjoyed making and baking their own green challah on Dr. Seuss Day at Associated's Thornhill campus. Teacher, Betty Sucharov, seen with student Ariella Hirsch, even made a new cover for the classic book Green Eggs and Ham. The students also enjoyed writing Dr. Seuss-inspired stories and rhymes.

CLEAN-UP TIME: Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School Senior kindergarten and Grade 7/8 students teamed up to clean up a local park. The entire school participated in Mayor David Miller's "20-minute makeover," spreading out to clean up six area parks for 20 minutes. The environment is the current tikkun olam focus at Paul Penna DJDS, which is in the process of becoming certified as an Ontario Eco School.

BIALIK ECO-WALK: As a fun way to further its environmental initiatives, Bialik Hebrew Day School recently held a school-wide Walk to School Day, during which students, parents, and staff arrived at school on foot, bikes, in-line skates and scooters.

Anti-Semitic crime statistics refuted

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A May 5 article in the prestigious Israeli daily Ha'aretz depicting Montreal's Orthodox community as living in fear in the wake of a supposedly rising number of anti-Semitic incidents and increased gang activity in the Cote des Neiges and Outremont districts bears little resemblance to the reality on the ground, Jewish community officials say.

Late last week, Quebec Jewish Congress president Adam Atlas and Rabbi Reuben Poupko, co-chair of the Jewish community's security co-ordinating committee, strongly refuted suggestions made in the article that Jews are being singled out for targeting, that members of the community "are afraid to leave their homes," or that the Chabad community has recently seen a spike in violent incidents against it.

The Ha'aretz article appeared to be based on a front-page story in the April 28 issue of the Jewish Tribune, B'nai Brith Canada's Toronto-based weekly house organ newspaper.

The Tribune headline read:"Crime wave targeting Jews in Montreal strikes fear in community."

Rabbi Poupko said Ha'aretz should have used better sources for its story.

"I would have preferred if Ha'aretz had consulted with organizations that are actually based in Quebec, that have credibility in Quebec and know the scene well," Rabbi Poupko said. He added that B'nai Brith has "limited knowledge" of Montreal and "limited credibility" there.

Even Rabbi Mendel Marasow, the executive director of Chabad's Beth Rivkah Academy, who was quoted in the Tribune story as saying that "Jews make good targets," told The CJN last Friday that the Tribune article was "a non-story."

Rabbi Poupko termed the Ha'aretz story "a complete and total fabrication of reality," the idea that Jews in the areas were afraid to leave their homes.

"All you need to do is talk to members of the Chabad community," he said. "I see them all the time, and they seem perfectly happy and perfectly comfortable walking down the streets. I would have preferred if Ha'aretz had actually spoken to people actually engaged in security, and with the police and with all the communities."

Atlas, in an interview from Israel last Thursday, indicated he might seek a meeting with Ha'aretz journalists "to have a conversation with them" about the May 5 article.

Atlas noted that while there was a spike in vandalism and anti-Semitic incidents in Outremont during Quebec's "reasonable accommodation" hearings close to three years ago, and there have been "some disturbing events," such as last March's vandalism at the Visnitz synagogue in Outremont, "in relative terms, the atmosphere is not one of alarm."

Sensational headlines in the Tribune and Ha'aretz notwithstanding, a closer look at those quoted in the Tribune story seems to belie the headlines: Simonetta Barth of the area's police station 26 says that a robbery involving a Jewish victim didn't appear to be anti-Semitic, and relations between the police and Jewish community are depicted as excellent.

According to one highly placed source who would speak only on background, the so-called "crime wave" depicted in the Tribune article amounted to "one kid with spray paint who daubed several places.

"As far as we are aware, there have been no acts of violence on anyone," the source said. "There was one guy who threw rocks through four institutions and broke some glass. If this is a crime wave, it's the smallest crime wave in the history of mankind."

The source also suggested that the article "illustrates the danger of having an advocacy body needing to raise money."

Rabbi Poupko said what angered him was "that by [the story] getting into Ha'aretz, it has begun to have an impact on how people perceive the Montreal community."

He said even if there had been a rise in street or gang crime in the areas where Orthodox Jews live, "what does that have to do with rocks thrown through windows and graffiti? They're lumping things together that don't belong."

Al Jazeera launches English language service

Compiled by CJN Staff

Tony Burman, managing director of the Al Jazeera English (AJE) satellite news channel, may have a lot to talk about with the Jewish community come November.

The channel – owned by the government of Qatar and based in Doha – became available in Canada last week on Rogers and Videotron cable, as well as Bell TV.

The Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission granted Al Jazeera English the right to be distributed in Canada in November 2009.

Because members of the Jewish community were concerned about whether the network would portray news from the Middle East in a balanced manner, staff from Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada met with Burman last November to discuss AJE and its objectivity as related to the subjects of anti-Semitism, Israel and Judaism.

The Jewish groups had concerns based on material on Al Jazeera's Arabic service, which has been criticized for airing anti-Semitic speakers and sources.

Congress CEO Bernie Farber said his organization, along with B'nai Brith Canada and others from the Jewish community, will meet with Burman and other AJE staff in November – this, after an agreement was reached to establish a review committee on AJE with members of all three organizations – to address any concerns Jewish groups might have after the network has been available in Canada for at least half a year.

"We received a note [on May 5] from Burman indicating that things are getting established… and he looked forward to meeting with us in six months for a review on how we feel about AJE in Canada," Farber said. "So far, he seems to be a man of his word. But we will keep a close eye on it."

In the past, Burman, a former senior executive at CBC News, has called any public perception of a relationship between Al Jazeera and Al Qaeda a "myth" and "nonsense." Al Jazeera English is also available in Israel.

Last May, appearing on TVO's public affairs program The Agenda, Burman said Canadians watching his network would discover a broadcaster that was "less western and less parochial" than existing North American broadcasters.

As of May 4, AJE became available to subscribers of Bell TV on channel 516, Rogers in Ontario on channel 176, and Videotron Digital TV on channel 173 in Quebec. The network plans to open a Toronto bureau next month.

Jewish legal group rejects anti-niqab law

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The association of Jewish jurists has come out strongly against Quebec's proposed legislation that would ban face coverings in provincial public institutions, saying it threatens religious freedom in general.

Bill 94, which is ostensibly aimed at Muslim niqab face coverings for women, "goes against the grain of every position taken by the Canadian Jewish community nationally, and in Quebec, in the past, in that it targets – in fact, if not in name – a specific religious group, namely the Muslim community, with respect to an activity which represents no danger to the rest of society," the Lord Reading Law Society states in its submission to the National Assembly committee that begins public hearings on the bill May 18.

"It is clear to [the society] that this legislation is a reaction by a government in a defensive posture against the outcry of the media," it states, calling the bill "a step backwards to the days before the Quiet Revolution," the modernization that transformed Quebec society in the 1960s.

The proposed law, entitled an Act to Establish Guidelines Governing Accommodation Requests Within the Administration and Certain Institutions, has implications that go well beyond the issue of the niqab, the veil worn by a very small number of Muslim women in the province, according to the society.

It charges that the bill creates a "hierarchy of rights," which would make the equality of men and women more important than religious and other freedoms.

Article 4 states that an accommodation must comply with Quebec's Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, "in particular as concerns the right to gender equality and the principle of religious neutrality of the state whereby the state shows neither favour nor disfavour towards any particular religion or belief."

"The result of this article is that 'accommodations' will be interpreted in the light of an over-arching principle of equality of men and women," the society states, and the courts will be "hamstrung in their ability to make a reasoned judgment" in individual cases.

"For example, if a woman wishes, for religious reasons, to wear a head covering such as a sheitel (wig) or a hijab [scarf covering the hair and neck], could this now be prohibited because Jewish men do not wear such wigs and Muslim men do not wear hijabs?

"Does this mean that even in the absence of any need for an 'accommodation' by others, that the free exercise of religious rights would not be permitted?"

The society says that even if Muslim women are wearing the niqab or other coverings because of pressure from their communities or husbands, it doesn't mean laws should be passed against it.

"Is it the business of the state to legislate the way in which persons exercise their religious rights, where no harm is caused to the state?" the society asks.

The bill is so sweeping that the society says "many other important religious practices, rituals and customs which would normally not be considered to be unacceptable, may be unintentionally caught by this legislation."

The society notes that the Supreme Court of Canada has on many occasions ruled that rights must be examined on a case-by-case basis and in light of all of the rights protected under the Canadian charter.

The bill "legislates conformity" that is at odds with the constitution's affirmation of Canada's multiculturalism, the society argues.

The Lord Reading Society, founded in 1948, is an association of principally Jewish lawyers, judges, notaries and professors. No sitting judge was party to the brief.

The community's two main lobby groups have been silent so far on Bill 94, which was introduced in March, torn between their traditional defence of a liberal understanding of religious practice and the fact that polls show the bill has the overwhelming support of Quebecers, and possibly concerns about Islamic fundamentalism.

After much deliberation, Quebec Jewish Congress (QJC) decided against making representations to the parliamentary committee.

B'nai Brith Canada Quebec region chair Moise Moghrabi said his organization has been grappling with the bill and has not yet come up with a definitive position.

He predicts that, if passed, the bill will be contested all the way to the Supreme Court.

yourself, your friends, your spouse/significant other or whomever in the you-know-where and get over to the Miles Nadal JCC for a mystical night of learning. For those of you who don't know, Shavuot (Shove-ooh-oh) is the celebration of the Jews receiving the Ten Commandments. You know why we got them? God offered them to a dishonest person, who asked what was involved, and when they found out they could not steal, they turned God down. God then offered them to a philanderer who asked what was involved, and when they found out they could not cheat, they turned God down too. God then offered them to a workaholic who asked what was involved, and when they found out they could not work on the Sabbath, they turned God down as well. Wanna know what happened next?

-OOH

ooh, ahh, I knew you'd be curious. So here's what happened. Finally, God offered the Ten Commandments to a Jew, who asked how much they'd cost. When God said "nothing" the Jew said, "They cost nothing? Great, I'll take Ten." Aha, so now you know the whole story. Here's a slightly more traditional explanation. Exactly seven weeks after we Jews left Egypt we arrived at Mt. Sinai (you know, on University below College) and were given the Torah, we then became a nation committed to serving God. Shavuot is a Hebrew derivative of "weeks" since we're counting them. We traditionally eat good cheesecake.

Hebrew University comes to Toronto

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Creating legal provisions that allow the torture of terror suspects in Israel is a "slippery slope," said Yuval Shany, the Hersch Lauterpacht chair in international law at the law faculty of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Shany was one of five Hebrew University professors to speak at the Adath Israel Congregation last week for the Best of Hebrew U, an event organized by the Toronto chapter of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU) as a way to connect Torontonians to the academic work being done at the university.

Yuval Shany, a professor at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, spoke at the Best of Hebrew U event in Toronto.

Shany, the event's keynote speaker, discussed the complexities of fighting a war on terror while maintaining human rights in a democratic society.

"We need human rights in part because we don't trust the majority to adequately protect the rights of the minority," he said. "Perhaps nowhere is the challenge to human rights more apparent than in the war on terror."

Israel "provides the perfect storm" in terms of the balance between terrorism and human rights, Shany said.

"Israel doesn't have a constitution. We do not have a charter [of human rights and freedoms]," he said. "Israel, on the one hand, has relatively weak instruments to protect human rights. On the other hand, it's facing vicious [terrorism]."

Dealing with terrorists in Israel and abroad is a unique challenge, Shany said, explaining that applying the basics of criminal law becomes complicated "when you have people who are willing to blow themselves up. [Courts] find themselves in uncharted [waters]. They have to invent new measures," he said.

This occurred in the late 1980s when Israel adopted a measure that allowed soldiers to apply "physical pressure" on terror suspects in exceptional cases. The rule was struck down in 1999 by the Supreme Court.

"The court was getting complaints… that moderate physical pressure wasn't that moderate," Shany said. "[The court] came to the conclusion that when you allow an exception, the exception becomes the norm."

He added that the court addressed the issue "in a smart way" by using the general defence of necessity under criminal law as a loophole. This means that, while torture is unlawful, those tried for the use of torture can use the defence of necessity.

"Under the new rule… the interrogator has to put their career and liberty on the line… The problem is this does not work," he said. "Not in a single case was an interrogator prosecuted. In the long run, the court was right but the policy was not carried through."

For event co-chair Paula Dodick, the Best of Hebrew U is a way for Torontonians to explore diverse topics through a different perspective.

"The range of topics… appeals to a variety of age groups and members of the community," Dodick said. "It's bringing what the university does [and] its best researchers to Canada."

Miriam Pilc-Levine, the national director of communications and outreach for the CFHU, agrees.

"It's our way of bringing the Hebrew University of Jerusalem to Canada. People don't always have an opportunity to visit Israel," she said, adding that the event used to be annual or semi-annual, but hasn't been run for around three years.

"We wanted to regroup," she said.

Other professors at the event included Ehud Cohen, who discussed the biology of aging, Howard Deitcher, who lectured on children and theological issues, Maren Niehoff, who talked about the Jewish Diaspora 2,000 years ago, and Aner Preminger, who analyzed two Israeli films.

For Preminger, a filmmaker and adjunct professor in the department of communications at Hebrew U, events like the Best of Hebrew U build important international relationships.

"I think… the relationship between Israel and the Jewish Diaspora are important for both. We in Israel need the support of Jews all over the world, and Jews all over the world need us. But it has to be a live relationship," he said. "Events [like this] are feeding these relationships."

Hillel awards 'all about the students,' winner says

By MICHAEL ISENBERG
Special to the CJN

The best part of the Hillel awards for Danielle Miller wasn't winning.

It was watching her bubbie.

"It was a great thing for my bubbie. It meant a lot to her. As a Holocaust survivor, the most important thing to her is her family, to see me doing something for the Jewish community," said Miller, who will be going into her fifth year at the University of Toronto for drama and English.

"To her, this is what life's about. "

Miller, along with Mayer Elharar, won the student engagement award at Hillel of Greater Toronto's 14th annual awards night, held on May 5 at the Wolfond Centre. The award paid tribute to Hillel members who help students get involved with Jewish life.

For Miller, this meant planning events that interest a wide-range of students, such as a night of improv at Second City.

"A lot of events I didn't plan, but just went to and was there to facilitate meetings. I'm the kind of person that, if there's somebody standing alone, I'll go talk to them," she said.

Zac Kaye, Hillel of Greater Toronto's executive director, sees the awards as a reflection of the Jewish community.

"Our immersive programming, our unique approach to connecting Jewish students of all backgrounds is what we're about," he said at the event, adding that Hillel is inclusive and works hard to cater to all Jewish denominations.

Alan Berdowski, Hillel of Greater Toronto's president, agreed.

"The goal of Hillel is to inspire every Jewish student," Berdowski said.

In describing Hillel's aim, Berdowski spoke specifically to the students in the audience.

"[The Jewish people] may take your contributions [to the community] for granted. You don't. I don't," he said.

Berdowski further emphasized Hillel's role for the Jewish people, stressing the importance of students becoming active leaders or taking on greater projects if already involved.

"We are about stimulating and developing an affiliation for students in the greater Jewish community and in Israel. We must stimulate a free flow of Jewish ideas."

Kaye, meanwhile, provided concrete examples of the work Hillel's done this past year, such as Harvey's Table, an initiative started in November 2009 and funded by Allen and Judy Berg. At Harvey's Table in the Wolfond Centre, students receive kosher meals for $2. Kaye also mentioned Hillel's international programs in Argentina, India and Israel, as well as its efforts to bridge tensions between groups on campus through multi-faith events.

Mayer Elharar won the student engagement award at Hillel's awards night. Beside him is Alona Geysman, a staff member at York University Hillel.

"It's very important to build the relationships. Be friendly. Inform [students]. Inform them of what Hillel's about, about the Jewish community, about Israel," Kaye said.

Other awards given out last week included the newly established outstanding alumnus award, given to Rabbi Adam Cutler from Beth Tzedec Congregation; the outstanding leadership award, given to Margot Bychutsky and Adam Solomon; the Tzedek and social justice award, given to Amy Kaldor; and the York University campus award, given to Brandon Crandall, Paul Transky and Ryan Leszner, the outgoing vice-president (internal) for York University's Hillel.

"[Hillel] is all about the students and what we do," said Leszner, who won the award for the second year in a row.

Toronto cantor perfects his own cheesecake recipe

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Cantor Marshall Loomer, who has served Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation for the past nine years, is better known in Toronto's Jewish community for his voice than his baking skills. But, in 1985, about seven years before he began to study nusach and liturgical interpretation, Loomer established a small business called Cheesecake by Marshall, and perfected his own cheesecake recipe.

Working as a salesman at the time, Loomer made a cheesecake for a friend who was catering a Christmas party, and his business took off. "I received 200 orders for cheesecake," he recalls.

Now he only bakes the cakes for Shavuot, the holiday commemorating the giving of the Torah, when it is traditional to eat dairy products. "The Torah gives us spiritual nourishment, and milk gives us nourishment [too]," Loomer explained.

Although he cooks a wide range of foods from standing rib roast to French green beans with honey-garlic almonds, Loomer doesn't bake anything other than cheesecake.

He started making them because he loved to eat them, he admits. "I make the heaviest cheesecake. It's very rich, very delicious."

Loomer prefers "100 per cent solid cream cheese" over lighter alternatives like ricotta or cottage cheese, and favours an "old-fashioned Graham cracker crust" for its flavour.

Although the cantor is conscientious about fitness – he has worked out five times a week for the past three years, and lost 40 pounds – he says he doesn't believe in "not enjoying food."

Loomer said that, as a rule, he watches his fat intake, but when it comes to dessert, he believes in either foregoing it, or indulging in moderation.

A stickler for quality ingredients, Loomer uses pure vanilla extract, not artificial, and sticks with butter, not margarine.

As well, he recommends a German steel or aluminum springform pan. "The cheap ones will rust," he said. "I learned the hard way. And buy one with a Teflon coating."

Loomer uses a basic recipe, with variations to create different types of cheesecake, like mandarin orange-glazed, or chocolate.

Cantor Marshall Loomer enjoys a cup of coffee at shul after services on a weekday morning.
[Frances Krafi photo]

But his personal favourite is a plain, sweet cheesecake with a sour cherry topping, a combination he said is "to die for."

CHEESECAKE BY MARSHALL

Crust:
graham cracker crumbs
1/4 c. icing sugar
2 tsp. cinnamon
1/4 c. melted butter

Using a spring form pan combine graham crumbs, 1/4 cup of icing sugar, 2 tsp. of cinnamon, and 1/4 cup of melted butter.

Using a fork gently combine ingredients. Transfer crumbs into 9-inch spring form pan and pat into the bottom of the pan evenly. Do not press too hard or crust will become solid due to the butter. Now place pan into the freezer while preparing the batter.

Batter:
750 grams Bakers or Philadelphia solid cream cheese
1 cup sugar
2 tbsp. pure vanilla extract
1/4 cup flour
3 eggs

Combine ingredients in a Mixmaster bowl and beat until creamy, scraping sides with a spatula until there are no lumps. Pour mixture into the spring form pan over the crust.

Preheat oven to 325 and place pan in oven for 60 minutes. Leave in oven after baked with door open, allowing cake to cool slowly.

Cracking on top is a natural characteristic of a well-baked cheesecake.

Sour Cherry Topping

2 tbsp. cornstarch
1/4 cup cold water
1 jar sour cherries
1/4 cup granulated sugar
1/4 cup corn syrup

Add cornstarch to cold water, and mix until there are no lumps. Add this mixture to the sour cherries, granulated sugar and corn syrup over medium heat in a saucepan until thickened. Allow this mixture to cool and top cheesecake with the cherry mixture.

Allow cake to cool overnight, or 12 hours refrigerated, and enjoy.

Dinner unlocks wildest dreams

By RANDY FINGRUT
Special to The CJN

Eating cheese before bedtime could help you choose the dreams you want to have, says a recent study by the British Cheese Board. Volunteers who took part in the British Cheese Board's "Cheese & Dreams" study ate cheese before they went to sleep, and none reported having nightmares or a poor night's sleep. The board's nutrition scientists explain that tryptophan, an amino acid found in cheese, was shown to reduce stress and induce sleep. Additionally, the research established that different varieties of cheese appeared to cause different kinds of dreams. With thousands of varieties of cheese on the market, and with even more ways to serve them, it seems there is a great deal for us to discover.

Get cozy with an appetizer dip that is light as a cloud. Lemon Feta Dip is a Greek style starter that is creamy and loaded with cheese. Serve it along with fresh crudités, and for that extra touch, include some warm pita bread. Delightfully rich and satisfying, Mediterranean Vegetable and Goat Cheese Pie is an all-in-one main course. The pie is very tasty served warm or at room temperature, and is just the right choice for an out of the ordinary dinner.

LEMON FETA DIP

4 oz. feta cheese, broken into pieces
1/2 cup dry pressed cottage cheese, low fat
1/3 cup plain yogurt, low fat
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
1 garlic clove
1 tbsp. honey
1 tsp. dry oregano
1/4 tsp. freshly ground pepper

In food processor, or blender, process all ingredients until smooth.

Crudités

Include your choice of: celery sticks, carrot sticks, red, yellow and/or green pepper slices, broccoli flowerettes, cauliflower flowerettes, asparagus spears, zucchini sticks.

MEDITERANIAN VEGETABLE AND GOAT CHEESE PIE

Pie Shell
1 1/2 cups all-purpose flour, plus extra for rolling
1/2 cup unsalted butter, cut into small pieces
1/4 tsp. salt
1 large egg yolk mixed with 2-5 tbsp. ice water plus extra ice water if needed.
2 tbsp. chives, finely chopped

In food processor, combine flour, butter and salt, pulse until butter is broken down. Add egg mixture and pulse until mixture resembles course crumbs, add more water if necessary. Add chives in with one or two pulses.

Remove dough from processor and place onto a piece of parchment or waxed paper. Shape dough into a disc and wrap. Chill for 30 minutes.

On floured surface, roll dough into a 14-in. circle. Transfer to the bottom of either an 11-in. flan pan with a removable bottom or a 10 in. spring form pan. Press dough up the sides of the pan. (For spring pan: Crimp dough, using thumb and forefinger or a fork, to form a scalloped edge.) Remove excess dough. Using a fork pierce holes throughout the pie shell. In a 400-degree oven, bake pie shell for 20 minutes or until crust is golden brown, piercing again with fork if dough bubbles up. Remove from oven and cool 5 minutes.

Filling
3 large eggs
1 cup plain low fat yogurt
1/2 tsp. salt
4 oz. Mozzerella cheese, grated
10 1/2 oz. goat cheese
1/4 cup olive oil
1/2 small eggplant, peeled and sliced into thin slices
1/2 small zucchini, peeled and sliced into thin slices
1 small red pepper, thinly sliced
1 large garlic clove, finely chopped
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
small bunch of fresh chives, washed and finely chopped
1/4 cup sliced black olives

In bowl, combine eggs, yogurt, 1/4 tsp. salt and half of the Mozzarella cheese. Slice goat cheese and spread over bottom of pie shell. Pour egg mixture over goat cheese and sprinkle remaining Mozzarella cheese on top.

Bake at 400 20 – 30 minutes or until browned. Meanwhile, heat oil in frying pan, when hot, add enough thinly cut vegetables slices to fit comfortably in a single layer. Sauté vegetables and some of the garlic about 4 to 5 minutes, until golden and tender, turn several times.

Drain on paper towels. Repeat with remaining garlic and vegetables, adding more oil if needed. Toss with salt and pepper. Remove pie from pie pan or spring form onto a platter. Arrange vegetables on top of tart. Garnish with chives and black olives. Serve immediately or at room temperature.

Israel, Canada unite in fight against prostate cancer

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Prostate Cancer Canada (PCC) and the Jerusalem-based Institute for Medical Research Israel-Canada (IMRIC) signed a partnership agreement last week, joining forces to battle prostate cancer, the most common cancer affecting Canadian men. They plan to work together in fundraising, education and research.

IMRIC, which is part of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, is involved in international research collaborations on medical problems ranging from diabetes to HIV/AIDS.

Almost 400 people – among them members of Parliament, senators and six cabinet ministers – attended the May 5 reception hosted by Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU) and the Canada-Israel Interparliamentary Group in association with the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee in celebration of Canadian-Israeli partnerships. CFHU has raised $20 million of a total $50-million commitment for IMRIC and its collaborative research.

"Canadian researchers have tremendous expertise and are doing groundbreaking work in prostate cancer research," Steve Jones, president and CEO of PCC, said in a news release. "We're excited to develop this relationship with IMRIC that will allow us to work together at home and internationally, so that we can improve diagnosis, treatment, and eventually find a cure for men, wherever they live."

One in six Canadian men is diagnosed with prostate cancer, according to the release from CFHU.

CFHU national director Rami Kleinmann told The CJN, "We felt our duty should be not only as fund provider, but as a catalyst for advancing the scientific relationship between Canada and Israel."

IMRIC has almost half a dozen major partnerships with Canadian researchers, he said. Among them is a partnership with the University of British Columbia and the Rick Hansen Foundation in the area of spinal cord injuries, and a cancer-related epigenetics project with McGill University.

From left, Dr. Howard Cedar, chair of the Institute for Medical Research Israel-Canada's (IMRIC) department of development biology and cancer research, Nathan Lindenberg, national president of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, and Bob Shiell, vice-president of Prostate Cancer Canada (PCC), sign a memorandum of understanding between PCC and IMRIC.

Initiatives planned in conjunction with the new partnership include a countrywide speaker series to raise awareness about prostate cancer, Kleinmann said.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

DONOR AWARENESS: About 450 people attended an April 29 event at 770 Chabad Gate in Thornhill that raised awareness about kidney disease and the need for transplants. By the end of the evening, organized by Chabad institutions in the GTA, 17 people had signed up to become kidney donors with Renewal Toronto, an organization that helps find kidney donors for those in need. So far, the organization has seven people on its recipient list and about 30 potential donors. The event included a speech by Rabbi Ephraim Simon of New Jersey, inset, who donated a kidney about one year ago.

BOWLING CHAMPS: The Toronto chapter of Save a Child's Heart raised $75,000 this year through its second annual Bowl Your Heart Out event. About 150 participants came out to the tournament, held at Playtime Bowl. All funds raised go to Save Child's Heart, a humanitarian organization that helps bring children from developing countries to Israel for free heart surgery. Becel Ride for Heart set for June 6

Compiled by CJN Staff

The Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario's 23rd annual Becel Heart&Stroke Ride for Heart takes place on on Sunday, June 6.

Cyclists and in-line skaters – more than 13,000 of them – will gather that Sunday morning in downtown Toronto, ready for the ride that saves lives.

It's a once-a-year event, a unique morning when there will be no traffic on the Gardiner Expressway and the Don Valley Parkway. As they move along the Gardiner and the DVP, the participants will not only be having fun but they'll also be riding or skating with a common goal – to raise critical funds for the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario and end heart disease and stroke in Canada.

Your fundraising and participation in the Becel Heart&Stroke Ride for Heart can mean the difference between life and death for millions of Canadians. The Heart and Stroke Foundation will use the funds to support breakthrough medical advancements, social change and education that will prevent and reduce death and disability from heart disease and stroke.

The Becel Heart&Stroke Ride for Heart is one of Canada's largest cycling fundraisers. In 2009, participants raised more than $3 million. This year, the goal is $3.25 million.

If you join the ride on your bicycle, you can take your choice of several routes. Go 25 or 50 kilometres – it all counts.

If you feeling really ambitious, you can challenge yourself with the 75-kilometre route. Just raise a minimum of $80 in pledges in addition to your registration fee. The 75-kilometre start time is 6:45 a.m. And you can take advantage of an early bird start at 7:15 a.m. for the 25-and-50-kilometre routes if you fundraise a minimum of $80.

If you're an in-line skater, you can complete an eight-16- or 24-kilometre route on the Gardiner, west of Exhibition Place.

For your safety, helmets are mandatory. Knee pads and wrist guards are recommended for in-line skaters.

The registration fee covers the cost of hosting this event. The registration fee includes everything you need for a great ride: traffic-free access to the DVP and the Gardiner; rest stations with food and beverages; a delicious heart-healthy lunch; route marshals for your safety; mechanical support for your bike and an exciting post-ride celebration

When you register early, it will give you plenty of time for fundraising. The easiest way to register, and to collect your pledges, is online. When you register at www.rideforheart.ca, you can set up your own fundraising page to manage your account and reach your goal. You can personalize your page with a photo or story. Then all you have to do is send e-mails to your friends, family and colleagues. They can go to your fundraising page and sponsor you with secure online donations. And here's a fundraising tip – ask your employer to match the money you raise.

All your online sponsors will get an automatic electronic tax receipt. You can register online until June 1, 2010, at midnight.

You can also register by phone, 416-486-RIDE (7433); fax, 416-932-1620; or mail. Send the completed form before May 19, 2010, to: The Becel Heart&Stroke Ride for Heart, P.O. Box 1227, Station K, 2384 Yonge St., Toronto, Ont. M4P 3E4.

Becel Heart&Stroke Ride for Heart has some enthusiastic spokespeople.

A group of researchers come together from across southern Ontario as part of a team called Researchers with Heart. Marco DiBuono, the director of research for the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario, represents this group. Their goal is to raise $50,000.

The Survivors, heart disease and stroke survivors, will be riding on event day.

The VIP Fundraisers are local leaders and champions of the Becel Heart&Stroke Ride for Heart who through their significant fundraising efforts and outstanding support spread the word about the Heart and Stroke Foundation.

Among the fundraisers is Amanda Belzowski, who is almost 13 years old now. She has been selling lemonade each spring all her life to raise funds for the annual Becel Heart&Stroke Ride for Heart. She returns with her Lemonade Stand this year. It will be held on Sunday, May 16, at a new location: 33 Post Rd. in Toronto. Her four-year-old brother, Joshua, will be there as well with his Cookie Counter, to support this cause.

Yoga in Motion raises $200,000

Compiled by CJN Staff

The second annual Yoga in Motion at the Liberty Grand Entertainment Complex raised more than $200,000 for breast cancer research.

More than 400 women and men stretched, danced and sweated on April 25 to raise funds for breast cancer research at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute of Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto.

The day opened with Amber Payie from CHUM 104.5, the morning MC, welcoming guests, including Dr. Maria Shapiro, a Yoga in Motion ambassador and breast cancer survivor who shared her personal story. It inspired the crowd, and it showed how donor support has enabled breast cancer research to advance since Shapiro's diagnosis in 2004.

Then the fitness began! Some of the top fitness instructors in the Greater Toronto Area led four one-hour yoga sessions and four Zumba sessions.

סרטים שכדאי

שני סרטים זרים שהשאירו אותי המום ואני ממליץ עליהם בכל לב. ולמרבית שנצערו במדינות שונות ורחוקות זו מזו, שניהם עוסקים בפתרון תעלומות משפ ישנות שארעו לפני עשרות שנים.

הסרט הארגנטינאי The Secret in Their Eyes עורר בי סקרנות רבה, כי הוא זכה באוסקר הסרט הזר למרות שעדיין לא עלה אז למסכים בצפון אמריקה, ועד שהוא נוגר על המיבורים הגרמני.

זהו סיפורו של חוקר משטרתי בגמלאות שחוזר לחקור פרשת אונס ורצח שארעה לפני שנים רבות, תוך שהוא מתחבר שוב ליחסיו המיוחדים עם מפקדת היחידה שלו מארתם יגים.

למרות פער הטפה (הסרט דובר ספרדית)- הוא מצליח להצחיק, למרות ולרגש. בסרט הזה-כמו גם בסרט הבא- הקורבן מצליח לנקום בפושע בצורה מיוחדת ומרשלת.

שנביאה לציפה הבאה בלתי רגילה. תשע בסולם קורן.

לסרט השוודי The Girl With the Dragon Tatoo יש שם שבדרך כלל מבריח אנשים מהגנים. אז אל תתני לשם הזה להטעות אתכם. זהו סיפורו של עיתונאי חוקר שמתבקש על ידי מיליונר שוודי למצוא את אחייניתו שנעלמה לפני ארבעים שנה. הוא מגייס האקרית סדיסית מלאת טעקומים ונזמים ובעלת התנהגות מוזרה ביותר, שמסוגלת לחדור לכל מחשב שרק נצר כדי לפתור את התעלומה, ובמשך שעתים ורבע אתה יושב על קצה הכסא ולא יכול להסיר ממנה את העיניים. בעצם לארוך הסרט, כשהרקע להתהגותה מתברר יותר ויותר- לא יכול הצופה שלא להתאהב בה.

יש בסרט הזה קטעי אלימות ואביון ברמה שקרוב לודאי עוד לא ראיתם בקולנוע-אבל להפתעתי הרבה-נקמת הקורבן כל כך מושלמת, שהיא יוצרת הנאה מיוחדת ומשחררת שלא חויתי עד כה בסרט.

אחרי זמן רב-הוי סרט שאני מתכנן לראות פעם שניה, כדי לקלוט את כל מה שקורה שם, אחרי שהעלילה כבר יודעה לי. עשר בסולם קורן.

אחד מספריו האחרונים של עמוס עוז היה ספר שירה שענה לשם "כמו הים" ומספר דרך שיר את קורותיהם של אב, בן, ואהובת הבן. עבורי היה זה ספר מפתיע שגילה עז לא ידוע ביכולותיו של הסופר הלאומי שלנו.

ATHLETE WITH MS TO CLIMB FOR THE CURE

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Yonan Mintz would like to be one of Toronto's most eligible bachelors.

"My mom would kill me if I didn't put this. I'm happily single... Maybe that's a good intro," he said, explaining that his brother, a Toronto Star columnist, was listed as one of Toronto's 30 most eligible bachelors in the National Post.

Mintz, 37, is eligible enough. He eats well, stays healthy and loves sports. He plays baseball, hockey and squash. He mountain bikes, runs, goes to the gym three times a week and, this fall, plans to climb a mountain in Peru.

He also has multiple sclerosis. But that hasn't stopped him yet.

Mintz was diagnosed with MS, a disease of the central nervous system, last year. And in a few months, he'll spend four days climbing Machu Picchu, a mountain in Peru, to raise money for MS research.

MS is a disease that attacks myelin, the protective covering wrapped around nerves in the central nervous system, making it difficult for the brain and spinal cord to communicate. The effects of MS vary from person to person, but can include loss of vision, hearing, memory, balance and mobility.

While Mintz was diagnosed recently, he experienced his first symptoms in 1996, when he went blind in his right eye for six weeks.

"I had an MRI at that time, which was inconclusive," Mintz said. His neurologist gave him two options – to take experimental drugs as a possible preventative measure or to take care of himself and hope for the best.

"I chose plan B, but I did experience other symptoms over the years," Mintz said. "The most major thing was the chronic fatigue, where I'd be physically and mentally debilitated by an exhaustion that had a sense of vertigo to it. I've experienced that on and off."

About a year and a half ago, Mintz started feeling a numbness in his feet. He went back to the neurologist and was officially diagnosed.

"I wasn't surprised. I knew all along that I had it. I had a hunch. I think it was, at the time, it wasn't really earth shattering for me. It was more upsetting for some of my family," he said, adding that the hardest person to tell was his daughter, who will be 14 next month.

One of the most difficult parts of the disease, for Mintz, is the fatigue.

"Imagine being absolutely physically and mentally exhausted, light-headed, dizzy. It just makes all the simple things in life... like getting out of bed and putting your shoes on, pretty challenging. It could last a day to a week," he said.

Yonan Mintz with his daughter, Mattison Preston Mintz.

While Mintz has always seen himself as having a healthy lifestyle, everything changed after the diagnoses.

"The big thing was adjusting my diet. I wanted to take a holistic approach," he said, adding that he decided against taking injections, which is something that most patients with MS are offered.

"I wasn't very enthusiastic about the prospect of having to take daily injections. It's not that I wouldn't do it if I needed to, if I felt I couldn't manage it in a holistic way," he said.

His holistic approach included switching to a vegan diet, though he does eat some poultry and fish.

"I don't eat any processed foods, I don't eat any dairy. It's been cleaner for my system and I felt a difference," he said.

Mintz also takes a variety of vitamins and has taken up yoga and meditation to deal with stress, which can make his symptoms worse.

About a year ago, he heard about the MS Climb, which was started by Ralph Cochrane as a way to raise money and awareness about the disease. Participants can climb various mountains, including Mount Kilimanjaro, in Tanzania.

"I heard about it over the summer, and I knew this was my calling. It was clear. I knew this is what I had to do," Mintz said about the climb, which will start in October.

With the help of his mother, Ellen Litvak, and other family members, Mintz raised about $10,000 for the climb.

"I'm just very happy to support my son in whatever he does," said Litvak, the manager of Mintz's fundraising campaign. "If you talk to anybody, they'll tell you he's extraordinarily exuberant. He loves to take on challenges."

At first, Litvak was nervous about the four-day climb.

"I'm always proud of him, but I was a little bit nervous until I talked to people who had climbed Machu Picchu," she said. "I know that he really works hard at keeping himself in good shape. I think he's going to be very much OK with the climb."

Litvak's biggest concern is the altitude, which can be dangerous while climbing.

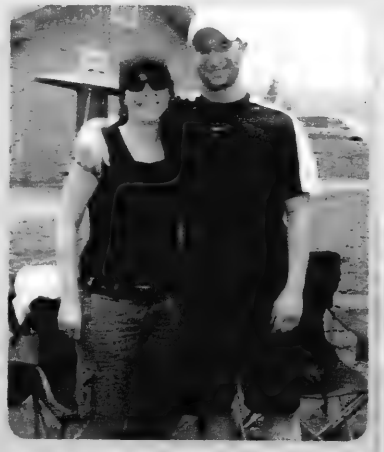
"Interesting enough [the effects of high altitude] actually mimics some of the MS symptoms, in particular fatigue and vertigo," she said.

Mintz isn't worried. Not about the climb or the disease.

"You can live a happy, productive life [with MS]. It doesn't mean you can cease doing the things you love to do... I believe I'm going to be healthy. I get up every day expecting to be healthy," he said.

"I don't resent it. I'm actually grateful for it because it's put me in a position where I can be an... example to others."

For more information about Mintz and the climb, visit www.msclimb.ca.



Yonan Mintz and his mother, Ellen Litvak, helped to raise about $10,000 for MS research.

Yonan Mintz, who was recently diagnosed with multiple sclerosis, will participate in the MS Climb to raise money for research.

PA reports violation of negotiation terms

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Just two days after resuming peace talks with Israel, the Palestinian Authority has reported to the United States what it termed the first violation of negotiation terms, a senior Palestinian official said Monday.

Yasser Abed Rabbo said the construction of 14 housing units for Jewish settlers in an east Jerusalem neighbourhood, as reported by the Israeli Peace Now pressure group, violated the terms of new talks.

"This is the first violation and first breach of the terms to start the indirect negotiations," said Abed Rabbo, the secretary of the Palestine Liberation Organization's executive committee, which on Saturday voted in favour of indirect negotiations under U.S. mediation.

"We will act immediately to stop this, because we will not agree that negotiations will be used as a cover for settlement activities," he said.

He added: "The PA is following this situation on the ground with the U.S.A."

A senior Israeli official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said that 14 homes in the Ras el-Amud neighbourhood of east Jerusalem were being built privately and that the government had no authority in the matter.

Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat, meanwhile, vowed to continue "planning and construction throughout the city for all its residents."

Barkat's comment follows a U.S. State Department announcement on Sunday that Israel had undertaken not to build in east Jerusalem's Ramat Shlomo neighbourhood for two years.

"We expect the Israeli government will react to the public demand of both the Arab and Jewish sectors and enable the construction of housing for the young population that is leaving the city because of a shortage of affordable housing," the mayor said in a statement.

"We trust that the prime minister will not allow a freeze in Jerusalem, not in words and not in actions."

An Israeli decision in March to allow the construction of 1,600 new homes in Ramat Shlomo triggered a severe crisis between Jerusalem and Washington, which led to a delay in the start of the indirect talks.

Cabinet secretary Zvi Hauser on Monday acknowledged it would take a couple of years before construction begins on the Ramat Shlomo project, but added that projects will be built in other east Jerusalem neighbourhoods where construction bids already have been issued.

The U.S. State Department announced on Sunday that the first round of indirect peace talks between Israel and the Palestinian Authority has been completed, saying that both Israel and the Palestinians had taken steps to create an atmosphere conducive to successful talks.

> 'Both Israel and the Palestinians will be held accountable for actions that undermine trust'

State Department spokesperson Philip Crowley said in a statement that U.S. special envoy George Mitchell has left the Middle East, after concluding that the talks were "serious and wide-ranging."

Crowley said Israel had pledged not to build in the Ramat Shlomo neighbourhood of east Jerusalem for two years and that PA President Mahmoud Abbas vowed that he would work against incitement of any sort.

Mitchell told the parties that progress is important so they can move to direct negotiations, resulting in a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The State Department statement also said that both Israel and the Palestinians would be held "accountable" for actions that "undermine trust" during the course of the proximity talks.

Mitchell will return to the region next week to continue the talks.

Sources close to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu responded to the American announcement on Sunday, confirming that the housing project intended for the Ramat Shlomo neighbourhood would not be built in the coming two years. The sources added that even when the Ramat Shlomo crisis first erupted, when the housing project was announced just as U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden was visiting Israel, Israel told the U.S. administration that the project was only in very initial stages and construction would not begin for at least two years.

"Prime Minister Netanyahu even announced this publicly after Biden's visit," the sources said. "Furthermore, the prime minister emphasized from the beginning that the planning and construction in Jerusalem will continue as always, just as it was during every one of Israel's last 43 administrations, and there has never been any Israeli pledge on this matter."

The sources also said that the Israel promised the U.S. administration to discuss all the core issues during the course of the proximity talks and to take confidence-building steps as gestures toward the Palestinians. On the other hand, sources said, the U.S. has promised Israel that the core issues, especially the most sensitive ones such as the fate of Jerusalem, would be resolved only after proximity talks progress to direct talks.

Earlier on Sunday, the PA responded to U.S. and Israeli calls for eventual direct peace negotiations by reiterating that it would engage only in proximity talks until Israel halted all settlement construction.

Netanyahu told the cabinet on Sunday that Israel expected the upcoming indirect negotiations to lead to direct talks, declaring: "It is impossible to make peace at a distance."

But Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat told Voice of Palestine radio in response: "If he [Netanyahu] announces a complete halt to settlement building, there will be direct talks."

Israel accepted into OECD

By BARAK RAVID

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The 31 members of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development on Monday unanimously voted in favour of accepting Israel as a member of the group, a senior Jerusalem source said.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was expected to convene a special press conference to discuss Israel's admittance into the Paris-based international economic group.

Israeli officials have said acceptance would be an important stamp of approval for the country's economy, boosting its credit rating and strengthening ties with foreign investors.

Three OECD members – Switzerland, Ireland and Norway – had previously expressed reservations about Israel's membership. They have focused on the settlements, which Israel does not treat as a separate economic entity. All new members require the approval of all 31 members.

Foreign Ministry officials earlier said that Palestinians had intensified their efforts to keep Israel out of the organization in recent days, saying that Israel infringes on Palestinians' human rights and violates OECD values.

Israel says Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Salem Fayyad called many of the leaders of OECD countries over the past day to argue against Israel's acceptance. One of the Palestinian arguments is that Israel provided false financial data by not separating out data related to the settlements.

Israel had launched a campaign of its own to bolster support for its membership. Netanyahu spoke to several other world leaders on the matter trying to bolster support for Israel's application.

Jerusalem Foundation dedicates 'Canada Club'

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — The Morasha neighbourhood of Jerusalem was abuzz on the evening of May 3, when Jerusalem Foundation donors and board members from around the world and passersby gathered to check out the newly opened Canada Club.

The club is at the Morasha Community Center, just outside the Old City. The new multi-faceted social, games, and sports facility was dedicated as part of the Jerusalem Foundation's annual international meeting. "It was a real highlight of our program," says director of the foundation's Canada desk, Steve Solomon.

The gathering brought together more than 70 board leaders and donors from Canada, the United States, Spain, Germany, Switzerland, Austria, South Africa, France and the United Kingdom in Jerusalem for three days. They discussed strategy issues and dedicated projects developed over the past year.

Canada Club is the brainchild of Torontonian Lewis Mitz, who co-founded it along with his wife, Wendy Posluns, Senator Arthur Eggleton, Camille Bacchus and Julia Koschitzky, president of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada. Koschitzky will soon celebrate the opening of the Koschitzky Young Adult Centre at the Morasha Community Center, which also houses the Musrara School of Photography, Media and New Music and the Machol Shalem Dance Studio.

Mitz says he came up with the idea for Canada Club after the mayor of Jerusalem, Nir Barkat, delivered a talk about the current challenges facing the city in Toronto last November.

"Two things that he said astounded me – first, how many young people are leaving Jerusalem after they finish university, and second, the great number of Israeli youth who have never been to Jerusalem," Mitz said. "I wanted to create a fun place for youth and young adults to come and hang out – a social club, a sports facility, a meeting place."

In addition to hitting the foundation's three "C's": culture, coexistence, and community, Mitz wants the Canada Club to hit five "E's": excitement, enjoyment, entertainment, encouragement and economy. "These are all part of the thought process that went into the idea," he said.

Mitz, who has served as a mentor in kids' programs for the last 30 years, understands the importance of a fun and safe place for them to go. "If kids have a spark in life outside of their parents, in any kind of mentorship form, it can be a life-changing thing," he said. "And this could be a life-changing thing."

Lewis Mitz, centre, and Julia Koschitzky watch as a rabbi (unidentified) attaches the mezuzah to the door.

Very quickly, Mitz was able to gather $36,000 (US) from the founding donors,enough to commence the first part of the Canada Club project: a coffee shop/snack bar in the community centre lobby.

The next project on the roster is a games room, which will include air hockey, foosball and table hockey games, imported from Canada. "Of course, hockey is the focus," Mitz said.

"This is one of the funkier, more exciting projects we have currently underway," Solomon said. He added that it's unusual for a donor to come to the foundation with an idea like the Canada Club. Usually the foundation determines projects and then seeks funding for them.

"This is the first time I'm aware that an idea was completely initiated by a donor that was then incorporated into our organizational plan," he said

The Jerusalem Foundation intends to raise funds to sponsor programs and activities at the new club. Meanwhile, Mitz has already determined upcoming club projects, for which he intends to elicit partnership with the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada. The first priority will be furniture for the centre, two beach volleyball courts, a tennis court and a floor ball court.

The club has already created a momentum of its own. Solomon said that he recently got a call from a local cinema school that wants to screen movies at the club. The centre will also host bands and a temporary gallery, featuring different artists on a monthly rotation.

"Our hope is that the Canada Club will be a spark for a fire that will catch wind and go," Mitz said. "This site is the beginning of something special in Jerusalem."

Yeshiva student murdered in Ukraine

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

KIEV — Ukrainian authorities have found the body of a 25-year-old yeshiva student who was reported missing more than three weeks ago. It's not yet clear if local authorities are treating the murder as an anti-Semitic incident.

Aryeh Leib Misinzov's body was found mutilated and dumped in a Kiev neighbourhood late last Friday night. Chabad officials identified him as the young man who has been missing since April 20, the anniversary of Adolf Hitler's birthday.

Kiev police believe Misinzov was kidnapped and murdered, and that his assailants mutilated his body soon after. One early report said the body had been cut into 10 pieces.

Local authorities have asked to delay his funeral pending further investigation, but Chabad has rejected a police request to delay it and demanded that Misinzov's body be turned over to his family for a proper Jewish burial.

Misinzov may have been involved in organized crime, according to reports.

Congress briefed on Palestinian glorification of terror

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As U.S. diplomats attempt to bring Israelis and Palestinians together for proximity peace talks, Palestinian society is being deluged with a message of war, martyrdom and killing Jews, said Itamar Marcus, director of Palestinian Media Watch (PMW).

In recent months, PMW has recorded 26 fresh incidents of Palestinian glorification of terrorism, said Marcus, who was in Washington, D.C., last week to brief Congress about the agency's findings.

Marcus presented the house foreign affairs subcommittee on terrorism, nonproliferation and trade, chaired by California Democrat Brad Sherman, with a report on the phenomenon.

Titled From Terrorists to Role Models: The Palestinian Authority's Institutionalization of Incitement, the report makes clear "terror glorification by the PA" continues and has been largely "ignored by the world for many years," Marcus said.

The report cites hundreds of instances "that illustrate the depth and breadth of the problem... It is a very significant problem because a child sees terror glorification everywhere he goes, that a Palestinian hero is one who kills Jews."

Itamar Marcus

"A Palestinian child can walk to school along a street named after the terrorist Abu Jihad, who planned a bus hijacking that killed 37, spend the day learning in a school named after Hamas founder Ahmad Yassin, in the afternoon play football in a tournament named after suicide terrorist Abdel Baset Odeh, who killed 31, and end his day at a youth centre named after terrorist Abu Iyad, responsible for the killing of the 11 Olympic athletes in Munich... Honouring terrorists envelops and plays a significant part in defining the Palestinian world," the report states.

Naming places and events after terrorists is an "ongoing Palestinian Authority policy," with the PA honouring those responsible for the most murderous attacks. "Two elementary schools, a kindergarten, a computer centre, summer camps, football tournaments, a community centre, a sports team, a public square, a street, an election course, an adult education course, a university club, a dance troupe, a military unit, a dormitory in a youth centre, a TV series, a TV quiz team and a graduation ceremony" were all named for Dalal Mughrabi, whose bus attack was the single deadliest terrorist incident targeting Israelis, the report says.

"Our message is that as peace negotiations are renewed, if there is a chance for peace, the peace process needs to be accompanied by an education process," Marcus said. "Terror glorification... is one of the primary problems that will prevent peace."

Marcus said PMW hopes that members of the U.S. Congress will call on their administration to press the Palestinians to end incitement. "The United States pushes Israel for far less serious issues," he said.

PMW is an independent NGO with seven Arabic-speaking employees who monitor Palestinian cultural institutions, including television, three daily newspapers and Hamas TV. Marcus said budgetary restrictions prevent the agency from fully monitoring Palestinian radio stations.

'Lady J' was integral to U.K. Chief Rabbinate

By PAUL SHAVIV
Special to The CJN

Obituary

Universally known as "Lady J," Lady Amelie Jakobovits – the widow of former British chief rabbi Lord Immanuel Jakobovits – passed away in London on Erev Shabbat, May 7, after a short illness. She was 81.

A major personality in her own right, she was born Amelie Munk, in Germany, into a prominent European rabbinic family.

As a child, she and her family fled the Nazis, hiding in a pit on a farm before successfully escaping to Switzerland. In later years, she would hold audiences of young people riveted as she told of using sawdust, earth and water to make symbolic matzah to celebrate Pesach during the war.

Married as a teenager to Immanuel Jakobovits, she was his consummate rebbetzin as his career progressed from London to Dublin to New York, and then in 1967 back to London, when he became Britain's Chief Rabbi.

There, her originally shy personality found its more extrovert dimension, and became an integral part of the Chief Rabbinate as Rabbi, then Sir, and finally Lord Jakobovits transformed his office into a national institution.

As the moral and religious influence of the chief rabbi rose into prominence in British life, she hosted thinkers, politicians, clergymen, journalists and statesmen in the famous Hamilton Terrace residence. She could be friendly to all, always recognizing the good in others, while meticulous in her personal, very Orthodox observance.

Amelie Jakobovits

Yet she also had the gift of personal chesed and was a one-person powerhouse of good deeds.

If you were Jewish and in hospital anywhere in central London, there was a good chance Lady J would appear at your bedside on a Friday afternoon with two small hand-baked challot, a jar of chicken soup and words of encouragement. If your family had suffered any sort of trauma or tragedy, anywhere in London, religious or not, you could answer the door and find Lady J there with food, medical supplies, clothing or whatever else was needed.

Every charity concerned with the needy, the suffering or the distressed could count on her patronage – and count on her to make a few phone calls to a circle of potential benefactors. Few could resist her requests.

She was also meticulous in calling – often to people she had never met – to congratulate them on a particular achievement, or an impressive interview or article, or to thank them for some gesture of support for the chief rabbi.

Despite having her own six children and almost 100 grandchildren and great-grandchildren, she would never miss calling to congratulate others on a simchah, or to wish a refuah shleimah – a speedy recovery – to the sick.

Lady J was a dynamic, entertaining and sought-after speaker. She loved to inspire and to tell, on the one hand, the story of her experiences as a young girl in the war and on the other, her experiences as a guest of the royal family at Buckingham Palace and Windsor Castle, including the meticulous arrangements made to accommodate the religious requirements of the chief rabbi and rebbetzin.

On the couple's first visit to Windsor Castle as overnight guests – a considerable distinction – the royal servants, unpacking the rabbinical luggage, identified the chief rabbi's tallit as a "holy blanket" and spread it reverently over his bed.

When her beloved "Mano" passed away in 1999, she devoted herself to her family and to helping others.

Sharp, no-nonsense, good humoured, energetic and caring, she was persona grata in every section of the community, bringing a good measure of continental flair and character into the otherwise dusty corridors of Anglo-Jewry.

Obama nominates Jewish woman for high court

JTA

WASHINGTON — U.S. President Barack Obama has nominated Elena Kagan to the U.S. Supreme Court, which would bring the number of Jewish justices to three.

Kagan, 50, is currently the U.S. solicitor general and a former dean of Harvard Law School.

Kagan, a New York City native, would join Stephen Breyer and Ruth Bader Ginsburg as Jewish justices. She also would raise the total of women on the court to three, with Ginsburg and Obama's choice to fill his first vacancy, last year, with Sonia Sotomayor, also a New Yorker.

Elena Kagan as dean of Harvard Law School

Kagan likely won't face Republican opposition in U.S. Senate confirmation hearings. A number of leading conservatives have endorsed her as a moderate.

As dean of Harvard Law, Kagan sought to redress what she perceived as an ideological imbalance by hiring conservative professors.

Jewish groups that have surveyed the likely picks – Obama reportedly was down to four – have been enthusiastic about the prospect of a Kagan candidacy.

Kagan would replace John Paul Stevens, a liberal stalwart who is retiring at 90.

Israel Briefs

Peres emphasizes security needs

President Shimon Peres told visiting U.S. envoy George Mitchell last Friday that Jerusalem was committed to reaching a Middle East settlement that would see the creation of a sovereign Palestinian state beside Israel, but that security must be a central focus of the talks. Mitchell arrived in the region earlier in the week for the launch of the first peace negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians, albeit indirect ones, in more than 18 months. During their meeting, Peres told Mitchell that Israel placed security at the top of the agenda for the upcoming talks. Considering the increase in rocket fire following Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip in 2005, this was of utmost importance, Peres said.

Axelrod: Leave Jerusalem for last

A top adviser to U.S. President Barack Obama said talks on Jerusalem should be left for last. "The president agrees that Jerusalem as an issue can't be the first issue for negotiations," David Axelrod told a small group of journalists working for Jewish media. Jerusalem should "probably be the last" issue negotiated, Axelrod said May 4, echoing the position of Israel's government, which is that the issue is too sensitive to discuss before other issues, including borders, are settled. Axelrod spoke after Obama hosted Elie Wiesel, the Nobel Peace laureate and Holocaust memoirist, for lunch. Wiesel had published an advertisement in the New York Times obliquely criticizing the Obama administration for pressuring Israel to stop building in eastern Jerusalem. Axelrod said Obama's lunch invitation to Wiesel predated the ad. Disagreements over Jerusalem in March had precipitated two months of U.S.-Israel tensions, which Wiesel declared were now over.

Livni urges joining political forces

Opposition leader MK Tzipi Livni, head of the Kadima party, last week called on Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to combine the forces of "the two large Zionist parties in Israel" – Kadima and Likud – to reach a peace deal with the Palestinians and bring about a social shift. "The prime minister is the one preventing the change," Livni told Ha'aretz. She blasted Netanyahu for "paying off" the haredim so he could avoid making a decision on the peace process. She said he's also evading a decision on social issues.

Israel deports Spanish clown

Israel's security service deported a renowned Spanish clown. Ivan Prado, director of the International Clown Festival in Galicia, arrived in Israel late last month with plans to organize a clown festival in Ramallah. The Shin Bet questioned Prado, as well as the Spanish national of Arab descent with whom he was travelling, for six hours before placing them on a return flight. Prado was accused of having ties to Palestinian terror groups. Since his return to Spain, Prado has launched a media campaign denouncing Israel and comparing the situation of Palestinians in the West Bank with Jews in Poland.

New envoy jeered

Israel's first ambassador in New Zealand in eight years was jeered by a group of pro-Palestinian supporters when he arrived to present his credentials at Government House last week. Shemi Tzur is the first resident ambassador in Wellington since 2002, when Israel withdrew its envoy because of financial restraints, leaving relations in the hands of its senior diplomat in Australia. The Wellington Palestine Group, which accuses Israel of crimes against the Palestinians, protested when Tzur arrived to present his credentials to Gov. Gen. Anand Satyanand. New Zealand froze diplomatic relations in 2004 when two Israelis were jailed for obtaining false New Zealand passports. Israel's then-foreign minister Silvan Shalom formally apologized for the men's activities in 2005, a move then-prime minister Helen Clark said was tacit recognition they were spies. Israel didn't confirm the pair as agents of its Mossad spy service.

Doc on ex-cons wins filmmaker Genie Award

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Alan Zweig's was surprised his film A Hard Name won a Genie Award last month for best feature-length documentary.

The documentary was a departure for the Toronto filmmaker, whose previous films, a trilogy on self-discovery, Vinyl, I Curmudgeon and Lovable, focus, respectively, on record collecting, crustiness and lovability.

A Hard Name, on the other hand, focuses on ex-convicts.

"I read in an article that when 'lifers' get to their 80s and get sick, U.S. prisons release them," Zweig says. "Since they were old men, prison officials weren't worried they were going out to hurt somebody and they'd release them, so they wouldn't die in prison."

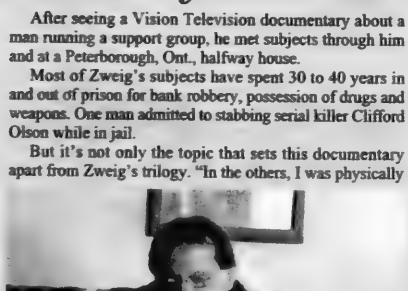
At the same time, he saw an interview with an ex-con who had been on America's Ten Most Wanted list. "He was 80 years old, a dangerous criminal that was out of prison and in a rocking chair – the contrast of those things intrigued me."

After Zweig received funding for the film, he ran into a snag when he started looking for subjects. "I couldn't find people that fit the bill or that would talk to me if they did. I found younger ex-cons, so it was talk to them or not make the film," he says.

After seeing a Vision Television documentary about a man running a support group, he met subjects through him and at a Peterborough, Ont., halfway house.

Most of Zweig's subjects have spent 30 to 40 years in and out of prison for bank robbery, possession of drugs and weapons. One man admitted to stabbing serial killer Clifford Olson while in jail.

But it's not only the topic that sets this documentary apart from Zweig's trilogy. "In the others, I was physically in them, and in this one, I'm not," he says. In his self-discovery films, he appears on camera looking into a mirror as he reflects on life.



One of the subjects featured on Primitive Entertainment's A Hard Name.

"In A Hard Name, I put myself in as a character in the background," says Zweig, whose voice can be heard as he interviews and converses with ex-cons.

"When I watch a film, if there's no voice or off-camera character, when something is said, I want it answered and commented on. If not, I start to feel like it's empty and cold, like the person is just saying things to me and nobody is answering for me in the audience."

Although A Hard Name was a finalist for the Special Jury Prize for Canadian features at last year's Hot Docs film festival, as well as being voted a top 10 audience favourite at the festival, Zweig says he's been criticized in the media for talking too much and not allowing his subjects to speak more.

But as the subjects converse with Zweig, they open up and tell him their childhood stories of abuse and about their adult struggles outside prison walls.

"Many ex-cons were surprised by intimate details fellow subjects told me about their childhoods and about things that might have made them seem weak – it's almost like breaking prison code," he says.

A broadcast of A Hard Name is planned for TVO this summer. The DVD is available at www.primitive.net.

Amsterdam is a beautiful Tower of Babel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

AMSTERDAM — Potentially hazardous volcanic ash from Iceland wreaked havoc on international aviation last month, grounding air traffic to and from Europe for several days. As a result, many travellers were stranded in European cities.

With a no-fly edict in force, I was "stuck" in Amsterdam. But I was not saddened by the news. What better a place to be marooned than the Netherland's cosmopolitan capital?

Due to these unforeseen events, I was given the golden opportunity to spend four extra days in this beautiful, sedate, compact city of romantic canals, exquisite architecture, atmospheric neighbourhoods and superb museums.

Whether I walked or used Amsterdam's fast and efficient transportation system of streetcars and buses, I had no trouble accessing these sights. Alternatively, I rented a bike to get around.

Being an ardent cyclist, I invariably resorted to pedal power, which, as I discovered, is probably the most enjoyable and carefree way of exploring this smaller, gentler, nicer, more intimate version of Paris.

Dedicated bicycle lanes, situated between roads and sidewalks, enable cyclists to reach destinations safely and quickly. And since Amsterdam's terrain is flat, bike riders need not work up a sweat. Amsterdam's bike friendly culture is not only environmentally sensible but fun as well.

I set out to explore Amsterdam from my base at the Savoy Hotel, which is in the funky Pijp district. There you will find the colourful Albert Cuyp outdoor market – where food, household goods and clothes are sold – and a dizzying array of cafés and restaurants.

I began with a 75-minute canal tour offered by the Blue Boat Company. Amsterdam's latticework of 17th-century concentric canals – the Herengracht, the Prinsengracht, the Keizergracht and the Singelgracht – are visually graceful and add immense charm and character to a busy city.

The boat passed under a succession of bridges and past striking gabled buildings and a number of houseboats.

By all accounts, there are 2,500 houseboats in Amsterdam, nearly all of which are permanently moored. I visited one such vessel, a former freighter that was converted into a houseboat and then a museum. Wandering through a deckhouse, a galley and a living room, I was surprised by their cosy dimensions.

The stolid buildings in Amsterdam, particularly those near the canals, are inspired by a mélange of styles – Renaissance, Gothic, rococo and neoclassical – and leave a visitor impressed.

The oldest existing building, I was told, dates back to 1590. Most of the rest, featuring flourishes and mouldings on their façades, were constructed from the 17th century onward, when Holland was a superpower with overseas colonies.

Virtually all the buildings are equipped with hoisting hooks on their roofs. Without these devices, furniture could not be moved by pulley up steep and narrow staircases.

In a word, Amsterdam's neighbourhoods are quaint and worldly.

The district around the Herengracht and Prinsengracht is especially appealing. There are canal-side cafés, antique shops, art galleries and boutiques to while away your time.

The Jordaan, once a drab working-class neighbourhood and today a haunt of university students and middle-class professionals, has been gentrified and is now considered one of the city's most desirable quarters.

Chinatown, close to the University of Amsterdam, is a reflection of Amsterdam's ethnic diversity.

Its foreign-born residents hail from nearly every conceivable corner of the globe, from Indonesia and Israel to Suriname and Morocco. Amsterdam is a Tower of Babel, a melting pot par excellence.

Chinatown, with its profusion of groceries and restaurants and its imposing yellow and red Buddhist temple, is adjacent to the red-light district, known in Dutch as De Wallen.

If only out of curiosity and titillation, practically every visitor to Amsterdam, including grandmotherly types with blue tinted coiffed hair, strolls through this fabled neighbourhood. What they see are its unique window bordellos, sex shops and cinemas and licensed "coffee shops," where cannabis is smoked and "space cakes" are consumed at leisure.

Dam Square, about a kilometre from the central railway station, is Amsterdam's throbbing core, teeming with glossy restaurants, tacky souvenir shops and hotels. Leidesplein and Rembrandtplein, both a short tram ride away, are at the centre of its lively nightlife.

Kiosks dispensing herring sandwiches, Holland's most popular fast food, are ubiquitous.

Amsterdam's prewar Jewish quarter, centred around the Jodenbreestraat and Waterlooplein, is a pale image of its former self, having been transformed by bland urban renewal projects.

Yet the Portuguese Synagogue and the Jewish Historical Museum, both of which have been refurbished, offer keen insights into the Netherland's venerable Jewish community. Sephardi Jews were admitted into Holland following the Inquisition, but Dutch Jewry was almost decimated during the German occupation and the Holocaust, an event that is amplified at Anne Frank House.

The Dutch Resistance Museum has a permanent exhibit about this dark period. The Diamant Museum, in part, recalls the prewar epoch when Amsterdam was the diamond-cutting capital and that industry in the Netherlands was all but controlled by Dutch Jews.

The city's art museums, notably the Van Gogh Museum and the Rijksmuseum, are grand repositories of Dutch masters ranging from Rembrandt to Hals. These famous painters were active during the Golden Age in the 17th century, when Amsterdam was one of the wealthiest cities in the world and the Dutch East India Company was synonymous with colonial expansion.

The Van Loon Museum, the former residence of the company's co-founder, Willem van Loon, attests to the opulent lifestyle that prominent Dutch merchant families enjoyed when the Netherlands possessed a far-flung empire.

The world's oldest botanical garden, the Hortus Botanicus, was established in 1638 as a medicinal herb garden. It is an oasis of 4,000 plant species from all continents. Its butterfly house and tropical greenhouse are of special interest. The Vondelpark, Amsterdam's largest municipal park and a haven of tranquility, is also well worth a visit.

The pleasant town of Delft, the birthplace of the iconic painter Johannes Vermeer, is renowned for its Delft porcelain. It, too, is worthy of a day trip from Amsterdam.

For further information, click on Information@Holland.com. The "I Amsterdam" card provides access to Amsterdam's public transit system and 40 free and 50 discounted offers on major tourist attractions and restaurants. Bike rentals are available at MacBike.

KLM Royal Dutch Airlines has daily direct flights to Amsterdam's Schiphol Airport from Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver. In addition, KLM has five flights a week from Calgary. For a fee of $25, you can use Pearson Airport's KLM Crown Lounge.

Dutch architecture is alluring.

FOR LOVERS OF DANCE, THEATRE & MUSIC: ISRAEL FESTIVAL OPENS MAY 25

The 49th annual Israel Festival, which opens May 25 and runs to June 11, presents artists from many countries performing in many venues in Jerusalem as well as Tel Aviv, Holon, Modi'in, Dimona and Haifa. Many dance performances are scheduled, including one by the Chinese Shen Wei Dance Arts to open the festival.

As for the stage, Shakespeare is a central theme of this year's festival: productions of Macbeth, A Midsummer Night's Dream, Romeo and Juliet and other works are in rehearsal, as are a variety of other theatrical offerings. Classical music, jazz, opera and other types of music are also included in the festival. www.israel-festival.org.il

JEWISH MAGIC: A new exhibition at the Bible Lands Museum Jerusalem reveals the magical and mysterious world of Jewish incantations, spells and curses. Angels & Demons, Jewish Magic through the Ages explores the practise of magic in Jewish tradition from ancient times to the present through archeology, folklore and superstition.

The artifacts include amulets, khamsas, jewelry, manuscripts and books of spells. Among the more extraordinary items are a child's tunic-shirt from the Bar Kochba period (132-135 CE), and an amuletic textile from Iran bearing a variety of images and symbols and the names of Haman's 10 sons; all evil directed at the owner of the textile was supposed to be deflected onto these sons of the notorious villain from the Book of Esther. The exhibition opened last week and remains on view through May 2011. www.blmj.org. Three of the artifacts are on display on this page.

RARE MISHNEH TORAH: The Israel Museum in Jerusalem has received the long-term loan of an extraordinary 15th-century illuminated manuscript – a handwritten copy of the Mishneh Torah by the great medieval rabbinical authority, Maimonides. On extended loan from Judy and Michael Steinhardt of New York, the manuscript has undergone full restoration and is to be displayed in the new Mandel Wing for Jewish Art and Life, in conjunction with the opening of the Museum's renewed campus, as of July 26.

Created in Italy about 1460, this beautifully illustrated Hebrew text includes the final eight books of the Mishneh Torah, the monumental and first systematic codification of Jewish law. The manuscript features six large painted panels decorated in precious pigments and gold leaf, as well as 41 smaller illustrations with gold lettering adorning the opening words of each chapter. These detailed illustrations are executed in the style of northern Italian Renaissance miniature painting.

TOURISM BOOM: Travel to Israel reached an all-time high in March. Some 313,000 tourists from around the world arrived in March, a 56 per cent increase over March 2009. That figure includes 5,906 Canadians, 24 per cent more than in March 2009. "We are thrilled to see this continued increase of travel to Israel in the first quarter of 2010," said tourism consul Oded Grofman, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office for Canada. Travel to Israel in the first quarter of 2010 increased 54 per cent over the same period last year.

ISRAEL NOTES

• The second Jerusalem Festival of Light transforms ancient sites and buildings around the Old City of Jerusalem into a magnificent light show, art and music spectacular, June 9 to 16.

• Dancer-choreographer Mikhail Baryshnikov performs in Israel with Ana Laguna, June 26, 28 and 29. The performances take place at the Suzanne Dellal Center, Tel Aviv, and at the Herzliya Center for the Performing Arts. Musicians Elvis Costello and Rod Stewart also plan to perform in Israel on their respective summer world tours, Costello in Caesarea on June 30, Stewart in Tel Aviv on July 1. The concerts follow performances by Metallica and Bob Dylan earlier this year.

• SunAir offers several personal guided flight-seeing tours over various regions of Israel. The tours include a 20-minute flight over Masada, Ein Gedi oasis and the Dead Sea; a 50-minute flight over Mount Sodom, the crater and fields at Neot Hakikar and Kikar Sodom; and a 70-minute flight around the entire Dead Sea region and Jerusalem. Tandem skydives, scuba-diving excursions and other adventure opportunities are also available. www.deadseadivers.com

• A collection of portraits by Andy Warhol has been donated to the Diaspora Museum in Tel Aviv for an upcoming exhibit. Subjects include Albert Einstein, Sigmund Freud, George Gershwin, Franz Kafka and Golda Meir.

• A new Design Museum opened recently in Holon. Its first exhibit features about 100 examples of contemporary international design, ranging from ordinary household items to life-enhancing technologies. www.dmh.org.il/default.aspx

• A rare 1,400-year-old wine press was discovered recently during excavations near Nahal Soreq between Beit Shemesh and Ashdod. The massive 21-by-54-foot octagonal wine press is one of the largest presses ever to be discovered in Israel, and is believed to be from the Byzantine period. The size of the wine press provides evidence that the quantity of wine produced was exceptionally large and meant for export to Egypt or Europe.

• Tel Aviv is planning to launch a bicycle share program next year. Modelled after similar programs in several European cities, the system will allow tourists to pick up a bicycle at one of 100 rental stations around the city and drop it off near their destination.

Israeli novelist documents a 'surreal' era

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"I needed to write about this surreal period," said Israeli novelist Assaf Gavron with a sense of urgency in his voice. "Suicide bombs were going off virtually every day. I just had to write about it."

Gavron's novel, Almost Dead, published in Canada by HarperCollins, is set in Israel during the height of the second Palestinian uprising in 2002 and 2003, when Palestinian suicide bombers terrorized many Israelis.

Assaf Gavron

The central character, Eitan Enoch, nicknamed Croc, is a 30-something Tel Aviv yuppie who survives a terrorist attack on the bus he takes to work each morning. Two days later, when the bus he is on is attacked again, Croc escapes death yet again.

Sitting in a Jerusalem cafe about a week later, Croc is rocked by another bomb attack. Once more, he survives.

After the Israeli media embraces him as a symbol of Israeli resistance to the bombings, Palestinian terrorists go after Croc. As Croc ducks and feints, Fahmi, a young Palestinian suicide bomb maker, lies on the edge of death in a hospital somewhere in Israel.

A very contemporary Israeli novel, Almost Dead has been described as a black comedy with the pace of a thriller.

To the best of his knowledge, it is the first Israeli novel to deal exclusively with that deadly era.

Gavron, 41, was a resident of Tel Aviv when Palestinian suicide bombers were running amok around Israel. Despite the obvious dangers, he relied on public transportation, taking a bus to work. He let his wife, a television news producer, use their car because her office was much farther away from their home.

At the time, Gavron designed kids' games for mobile phones. He worked for a high-tech company in the centre of Tel Aviv, which had been hit by bombers repeatedly.

"I was a little like Croc," he said in an interview here to promote his novel, which was published originally in Hebrew and has since been published in Germany, Italy and the Netherlands. "I tried to be cool about it. But it did get to me. I looked around, suspecting people. It was crazy and weird. That's why I had to write about it."

Miraculously, Gavron, a translator and writer whose short stories have been anthologized, was never personally involved in a terrorist incident. Nor did he know anyone who had ever been caught up in a bombing.

But on an existential level, he was deeply affected by the terror sowed by Palestinian bombers.

Gavron describes Croc as a somewhat confused guy trying to make sense of the world in chaotic and uncertain times. Fahmi, he said, is a like lot Croc.

Almost Dead, therefore, is about the ways the Arab-Israeli conflict intrudes into the everyday lives of Israelis and Palestinians alike.

Despite its topicality, Almost Dead garnered only mixed reviews in Israel, said Gavron, the author of four previous novels.

"Many Israelis have problems with this topic," he said. "

It was a difficult period because Arabs came into our cities and disrupted our lives. It was not soldier against soldier and army against army. People just don't want to remember it. But this was the book I wanted to write."

Even Gavron's editor was wary. "She didn't want to touch my book. She said she didn't like it and asked if I had something else for her to read, which is the worst thing an editor can say. There was something political here."

Gavron, a liberal who has voted for the left-of-centre Meretz party, describes himself as pro-peace.

But he is less than optimistic about the chances for peace. "I don't see a solution. Most people on both sides don't really want to go for it. The second intifadah depressed and disillusioned many Israelis."

Gavron, whose parents made aliyah from Britain in the early 1960s, currently lives in Berlin, the recipient of a one- year fellowship. He plans to return to Tel Aviv next February.

Before Berlin, he and his wife lived in London. More than a decade ago, he studied new media at the Vancouver Film School.

At present, Gavron is working on his latest novel. "It's about Jewish settlers living in illegal outposts in the West Bank. It's a comedy."

Gavron regards settlements as an obstacle to peace, but he thinks that settlers are among the last idealists left in Israel. "I've spent a lot of time with them, and their ideological passion is palpable."

Author melds fact and fiction in new novel

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

It was a time of murder and corruption, of wealth and extravagance, of poetry and fine wine.

And to Guy Gavriel Kay, it was irresistible.

Kay, the multi-award-winning author of 11 novels, lived with the idea for his latest book, Under Heaven (Viking Canada), set in the Tang dynasty of eighth-century China, for some seven years.

"The starting point is figuring out the time and place that I want to spend the next two or three years researching and writing about," said Kay, who is known for merging fantasy with history.

At first, Kay was interested in writing about the Silk Road, a trade route from Europe to Asia, but eventually became sidetracked while living in France.

"In 2003, 2004, I made a decision to go back to the South of France… and I would research and begin writing this book inspired by the Silk Road… and I was hijacked. I was abducted by the sights, sounds, smells, tastes and history of Provence [France]," he said, adding that he was inspired to write Ysabel, a book set in present-day France. Ysabel, released in 2007, won a World Fantasy Award

"I went back [to the idea of the East], because I always knew I was going to go back. The difference was that in the intervening three years, the ideas shifted a little bit for me… to being a book centred on the Far East itself, in the Tang Dynasty."

Kay's latest book follows Shen Tai, the son of a famous general who spends two years at the site of a historical battle, burying the dead from both sides as a tribute to his deceased father. As a reward for his services, he is given 250 prize horses, an unthinkable number, by the empire's former enemies, and must journey back to the imperial capital of Kitai.

Guy Gavriel Kay

While the book is fictional and has elements of fantasy, such as wailing ghosts or seductive fox-women, the story is immersed in the culture of the Tang Empire and the characters are loosely based on real people.

"I'll spend easily over a year [researching]," Kay said.

This research included reading anywhere from 75 to 100 books and articles, as well as speaking to academics specializing in that era.

"Out of the reading and research and correspondences, I end up emerging with the central themes I'd like to explore about that time and place," Kay said.

"I need to know why I'm writing the book, and in order to pay the mortgage isn't quite enough. I need to know what I'd like to convey to present-day readership. Then the narrative, the actual line of the plot, emerges, usually last of all."

When developing characters, Kay is careful to take the time needed to create a depth that others can relate to.

"I think all of us write the books that we'd enjoy reading… An engaging novel is anchored around… interesting things happening to interesting people," he said.

"The perspective of characters involves letting the book give you room to develop figures that will engage the reader. That the reader will come to care about."

While Kay admits there's no formula to writing the perfect character, he's found that the key is a sense of empathy.

"One of the central aspects of being able to do that is having the time to let [the characters] grow on you," he said.

When writing a novel, Kay's aim is to give a voice to both his female and male characters, something that can be difficult when dealing with the eighth century.

"One of the things that's always engaged me is the attempt to explore the female characters as well as the males and to give the women in the books room to develop and have some impact on events that unfold," he said.

"That's a challenge because I'm working with periods of history where women are constrained in what they were allowed to do," he said.

And he doesn't fail. Under Heaven's plot includes strong female characters who are nowhere as timid and subservient as they would like others to think and use their control over men to gain power.

While Kay's novel is shaped by its female characters, it can also said to be shaped by eighth-century poetry.

"As a writer, my first published work was poetry. I've always been reading it," he said.

While doing his research, Kay was intrigued by the role poetry played in the Tang Dynasty.

"What's really interesting was this was a culture that deeply valued the skill of expressing your thoughts in poetry," he said. It was part of being a cultured, influential man, and sometime woman, that you could write competent poetry."

In Under Heaven, Kay weaves poems, several of which he wrote himself, into the narrative.

"It's fair to say that [poems from eighth-century China] are some of the greatest writing anyone has ever done anywhere," he said.

Venus Williams ousts Peer in WTA event in Rome

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ROME — Former world tennis number 1 Venus Williams handily defeated Israeli Shahar Peer in straight sets to reach the last eight of the 2010 Internazionali BNL D'Italia, a major WTA event in Rome.

Williams was slated to face off against her sister, Serena, in the quarter-finals.

Peer, who reached the semifinals of the Porsche Tennis Grand Prix in Stuttgart, Germany, the week before, fell 6-3, 6-4 to Williams while giving up seven aces.

Prior to her defeat, Israel's most accomplished tennis player was impressive as she tuned up for the French Open.

Peer was masterful in easy straight-sets victory over Italian challenger Corinna Dentoni, 6-2, 6-1, to advance to the second round of the $2-million (US) tournament.

Peer, currently ranked 21st in the world, needed a little more than an hour to dispatch Dentoni, who is 184th. Peer then dispatched Polonia Herzog of Slovenia, whom she defeated in both of their previous meetings, setting up the showdown with Williams.

Shahar Peer

In Stuttgart, meanwhile, Peer lost to Belgium's Justine Henin in the semifinal of the Porsche Grand Prix. Henin, the eventual tournament winner, ousted the Israeli in straight sets, 6-3, 6-2, on Peer's 23rd birthday.

While Peer fell just short of the German tournament title, Israel's Dudi Sela took home 4,300 euros by winning the Rhodes Challenger in Rhodes, Greecce.

He defeated Rainer Schuettler of Germany 6-3, 7-6. It was a measure of revenge for Sela, who lost to the German in the semifinals in Athens the week before.

Israeli woman boxer retains title

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — In an event billed as Israeli boxing's most celebrated showcase, hometown girl Hagar Finer didn't fail to meet expectations.

Before a nationally televised audience and thousands of cheering spectators at Nokia Arena in Tel Aviv, Finer retained her WIBF bantamweight crown April 30 by handily defeating challenger Agnese Boza with a fifth-round knockout.

Finer credited the crowd with providing a home-field advantage that simply overwhelmed her Latvian opponent.

"I hope the Israeli people will get to know her even more," said Ra'anan Tal, Finer's trainer and manager. "We want to defend the title here in Israel because the refereeing abroad is hostile against us.

"We need to support boxing. In Israel we have sports besides soccer, and Hagar's achievements should not be for naught. We need the Israeli people to pump money into the sport."

The evening had all the trappings of a major fight. Before the bout, Finer was greeted with a rousing ovation from an audience that included some of Israel's most recognizable faces from the entertainment and sports world.

Her victory may prove to be a breakthrough moment for women's boxing in Israel. Though the sport remains in its infancy, boxing organizers can take comfort in the fact that they have found a charismatic, marketable ambassador in Finer.

Both fighters began the match hesitantly, but the bout gained momentum in the second round. Finer landed a number of crosses that kept Boza, who was at a distinct disadvantage against her taller opponent, on the defensive. Finer lifted her arms in the air triumphantly at the bell, and justifiably so.

The Israeli solidified her control of the bout in the third round. Boza, who replaced Finer's original adversary, American Stephanie Dobbs, was victimized by the champion's devastating right hand.

As time expired in the fifth round, Finer sent Boza to the canvas with a powerful right blow. Although Boza got back on her feet, the referee declared the bout over, as he ruled that the Latvian could not sustain the continue pummelling.

TEENS FOR A DAY

Six teams of CHAT alumni recently returned to their former stomping grounds for a taste of the good old days. Participating in a one-day basketball tournament, organized in part by hoops coach Aubrey Zimmerman, they reminisced and got back in touch with their old school. On the court, "99 Problems" defeated the "Legends" to capture bragging rights in the "Settle the Score" tournament. The winning team is, from left, Daniel Cantkier, Ari Sargon, Aaron Hershtal, Sammy Redlick, Robbie Bossin and David Safer. Absent is David Ulmer.

Book bank mitzvah project

By LAURA STRICKER
CJN Staff

When Emma Friedman celebrated her bat mitzvah in April, she wanted to give something back to the community in the form of a mitzvah project.

Emma, 13, an avid reader and writer, set her sights on the Children's Book Bank in Regent Park in Toronto. The Book Bank, which was established in 2008, accepts donations of new and gently used books for children aged two to 12 who are from low-income families.

Emma Friedman

To date, Emma has collected approximately 1,600 books.

"[One day] my dad and I were reading the paper and he noticed an article about the book bank. That's how we decided to take part in this project," she said.

Emma set to work quickly, soliciting donations from her school, Robbins Hebrew Academy, Bathurst campus, as well as Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, Toronto Heschel School and the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. Her synagogue, Beth Tzedec Congregation, also took part, sending out a flier Emma created for the project with their newsletter.

When asked why she wanted to donate to Children's Book Bank, Emma mentioned her love of reading and the importance of every child having access to books.

"This is a charity I really feel for, and it's something I want to stick with," she said. "[The] small things are so important, but a lot of us take them for granted... While I was collecting books, I looked at so many memories – all children [should] have these memories.

"I'm very happy with the amount [of books] that we've collected, and I'm even happier that books are still coming in."

Kim Beatty, founder and executive director of the Children's Book Bank, said she is grateful for the contribution Emma is making.

"It's an extraordinary act of commitment and generosity on [Emma's] part that we appreciate enormously. It's also a wonderful behaviour for role modelling for other children," Beatty said, hailing Emma as an "ambassador for her generation."

To make a donation to Emma's book collection project, e-mail her father, Michael Friedman, at michael.friedman@rogers.com. Children's books and monetary donations can also be dropped off directly at the Children's Book Bank, at 350 Berkeley St., Toronto.

For more information on the Children's Book Bank, visit www.childrensbookbank.com.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

About Life

Dear Ella,

My son Aaron's bar mitzvah is still a couple of years away, but I'm starting to think about it now. Aaron's father and I are divorced, and I don't know how that's going to affect Aaron's bar mitzvah.

Do we each have our own celebration? Do we have one together? Do we split everything down the middle? I have no idea where to start. Aaron's dad and I tolerate each other and communicate for the sake of our two sons, but the divorce left us both very bitter, and we certainly don't share any kind of friendly feelings. Financially, I'm not in the same bracket as Aaron's dad, and I can't afford to split an elaborate affair. Can you provide any kind of guidelines on how to handle this?

Bar Mitzvah Battle

Dear Bar Mitzvah Battle

Aaron's bar mitzvah is a very important day, and one he will remember for his entire life. With that said, both parents must bend over backward to make this day very special, and everything else must take a back seat. If the two of you can't be clear on that, then decide early and have separate celebrations.

Ideally, it would be special for Aaron to have all his family and friends together to celebrate his religious rite of passage. This will take much give and take from both of you, and complete co-operation and compromise. There are so many components involved: aliyot, invitation wording, cost, seating plans, number of guests, candlelighting, speeches, etc. All decisions should be put in writing, so there are no misunderstandings. Under no circumstances can Aaron be put in the middle. That's not to say that he shouldn't be involved in planning his bar mitzvah. He may have some very specific thoughts.

As long as the two of you continue to put your son's feelings ahead of your own, you should be able to get through this with class and maybe even have some fun! As for cost, split everything down the middle and budget according to what's affordable for both parents. A bar mitzvah can be very meaningful and tasteful without all the hype you often see these days. This is Aaron's day, a day he will have prepared and studied for. He'll be nervous enough. Make sure he's not nervous about either of you.

Being a mensch and good karma

Karma is an idea that exists in many cultures and simply put it means that for every action you take, there will be a reaction in the future.

So with karma, we are responsible for all of our actions, our choices, words that we say and even what we think. You cannot hide from karma. There's no escaping it. And as the saying goes, "What goes around, comes around."

Life Coach Corner

By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

Now before you stop me and say karma isn't a Jewish concept, there is a Jewish view on karma that is talked about by Tzvi Freeman in an article called Do Jews Believe in Karma? He maintains that "karma is the idea that everything is within the system and so everything bounces back eventually. You can play around with the system and even manipulate it, but you can't escape it."

But he also says, that "divine providence (hashgacha) means that we can reach beyond the system. We can plead with the Creator of the system or do tshuvah (repent) and transform our selves and even change our past. Freeman continues, "Yes, karma envelops us and all that exists. But there's an escape hatch through tshuvah, through Torah and good deeds."

But that is the caveat. The person has to be prepared to repent and put out love, kindness and generosity of spirit, and become a mensch in order to have the negative karma reversed.

You can spot a mensch a mile away. They do good simply because it's in their heart to do so. As Guy Kawasaki writes in his book, The Art of the Start: "Mensch is the Yiddish term for a person who is ethical, decent and admirable. It is the highest form of praise one can receive from people whose opinions matter."

Kawasaki adds: "Menschs do not put personal self-interest above doing what is right. Menschs are not only looking out for number 1. Menschs admit when they are in the wrong, and they acknowledge talent and skills in others, even if it exceeds their own. Menschs are friendly and good people who wish others well."

Kawasaki goes on to say, "You can spot menschs by their sincere desire to help others." And he asks people if they want to move into menschdom to follow these three easy steps.

"1. Do something nice for someone you don't like. Start small, so it doesn't hurt too much.

"2. Do something really nice for someone you like. But, don't tell them. Never let them know.

"3. Do something nice for someone you don't know. Be sure you do it sincerely to help them and not to position yourself in their good graces."

Good karma is easily achieved by good people. There is a lovely book to that end called Instant Karma, by Barbara Ann Kipfer. The book is full of simple suggestions to enlighten your life. Some of my favourites are: "Give your best self to the world; soften your most stubborn opinions; lighten up – you will live longer; everything is possible; the way we choose to see the world creates the world we see; don't jump to conclusions; let go of unrealistic expectations; practise silence of the heart by loving and by avoiding selfishness, hatred, jealousy and greed; don't blame anyone, including yourself, for life's disappointments; let go of minor annoyances before they become major conflicts; when you like someone, tell them; and start every day a little happier."

The HST: what homeowners need to know

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

It's coming for you. For renters and owners, for sellers and buyers. For renovators and mechanics, for electricians and landlords. Some call it a saviour for Canadian businesses, others insist it's just another tax hike. Either way, come July 1, the governments of Ontario and British Columbia will introduce the harmonized sales tax (HST).

What is it?

The HST will combine the provincial and federal taxes into a single, blended sales tax. In Ontario, it will amount to 13 per cent on many goods and services – eight per cent for the provincial portion and five per cent for the federal portion, now known as the GST – while in British Columbia, it will be a 12 per cent tax.

Why?

According to the government of Ontario's website, businesses are paying about $4.5 billion in embedded taxes because of the provincial sales tax, which is applied to the production, distribution and retail level of all businesses, making it a tax on a tax on a tax. The HST will eliminate this by providing a credit for sales tax.

For example, if an electrician has to pay HST on electrical outlets, he or she will get a tax credit for the provincial tax paid. The Ontario and B.C. governments hope that this will make businesses in their provinces more competitive and therefore create more jobs and opportunities.

The HST has already been implemented in Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and Labrador and New Brunswick. In Nova Scotia the provincial portion of the HST will increase from eight per cent to 10 per cent on July 1, making the total HST 15 per cent.

Stephen Dupuis

What about me?

According to Matthew Thornton, manager of government relations for the Ontario Real Estate Association, homeowners will be hit hardest by the new tax reform.

"The HST is certainly a bad thing for homeowners in particular," Thornton said. "These are the people who will be bearing the brunt of the tax. It'll make not only buying, but owning a home difficult."

This, said Thornton, is because homeowners will now have to pay the provincial portion of the HST on a multitude of goods and services that weren't subject to provincial sales tax before. These include lawyer fees, realtor fees, home renovation labour, and home heating, electricity and natural gas fees.

To offset these additional fees, the government of Ontario will be providing transition rebate cheques. Couples and single parents making less than $160,000 will receive a rebate of $1,000 over three payments and single people making less than $80,000 will receive $300.

What if I want to buy a house or condominium?

The HST will only apply to the price of new houses or condominiums, which means that the price of existing houses won't be affected.

Still, this doesn't mean potential buyers of existing homes are off the hook, said Cameron Muir, chief economist of the British Columbia Real Estate Association.

"The HST is going to have an impact on home transactions," he said. "[Buyers] are going to have to pay [more] on home appraisals and real estate commissions."

Condo maintenance service fees will also be affected by the HST.

Buyers of new houses won't have to pay HST for homes costing up to $400,000 in Ontario, where the government will be providing a rebate of up to $24,000 for those buying newly built homes. HST will be charged for houses costing more than $400,000. This means that, if a new house costs $500,000, the buyer will be paying HST on $100,000 of that amount.

In B.C., buyers of new houses won't have to pay HST on houses priced up to $525,000, Muir said.

The HST is being charged on new homes bought after June 18, 2009, in Ontario and Nov. 18, 2009, in B.C. that will be transferred after June 2010. If buyers purchased these houses before June 18 in Ontario and Nov. 18 in B.C., they would have been exempt from the tax reform, even if they move in after June of this year.

Rent not affected by HST

Stephen Dupuis, president and CEO of the Building Industry and Land Development Association, doesn't think the HST is the end of the world for builders and developers.

"I hesitate to say that it won't be a terrible thing, but it won't be a massive transition," he said, adding that this is because builders had to make a similar transition when the GST was introduced in 1991.

"We've been there, done that."

Still, the HST will affect renovators, Dupuis said.

"Renovations have no rebates at all. Basically, renovators will now have to add eight per cent on every bill."

Consumers may have already seen this increase. Starting May 1, the HST has been charged on goods and services that will be used after July 1, such as gym memberships, airline tickets and contracts for services such as landscaping.

What about renters?

Rent won't be affected by HST, said Thornton, adding that Ontario recently announced that the government will be limiting allowable rental increases for this year. While this is good news for renters, it may be bad news for landlords, who will be paying HST on services such as building or rental unit maintenance.

"Landlords are going to incur additional HST, but if they can't pass it on to tenants, it's certainly an issue," Thornton said.

Don't get hung up on the math

The bottom line

Dupuis doesn't deny that the math behind the new tax reform can be confusing.

"What I tell everybody trying to understand all of this is not to make yourself crazy trying to follow the math. Go right down to the bottom line, the asking price. That way, you can compare X to Y," he said. "Don't get hung up on embedded tax."

Housing prices and listings soar this spring

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

A record number of "for sale" signs have been popping up on front lawns this spring as homeowners race to beat new mortgage regulations and the Harmonized Sales Tax.

According to the Canadian Real Estate Association, there were almost 100,000 new residential listings this March, a 20 per cent increase from the last record, set in March 2008.

CREA statistics also showed that house prices have increased this year, with the national average price of homes sold in March at $340,920, the second highest national average price on record.

Gregory Klump, CREA's chief economist, attributes this to the economy.

"In late 2008, early 2009, we were heading into a period of great economic uncertainty. Buyers moved to the sidelines, sellers were faced with fewer offers and many of those that did make offers, [made] low ball offers... Sales activity all but dropped off the face of the earth... Anyone who wasn't forced to sell their home didn't," Klump said. "As the economy recovered, buyers came back in droves."

Average house takes 60 days to sell

Buyers in Ontario and British Columbia may be trying to avoid the HST, which comes into effect July 1 and combines the provincial and federal sales tax.

"Sellers who had moved to the sidelines began to put their home back on the market. That particularly was the story in recent months of people looking to trade up before...the HST in Ontario and BC," Klump said.

Jeffrey Wagman, a realtor from Forest Hill Realty in Toronto, hasn't seen an increase in activity specifically because of the HST.

"[The HST] is not applicable to the price of an existing home, only on new homes. I haven't seen a major increase in that at all," he said.

The HST will only affect homes priced over $400,000 in Ontario and $525,000 in British Columbia, since buyers will be getting rebates that cover the PST.

According to Klump, new mortgage regulations may be another reason that listings have skyrocketed this year.

In February, the federal government announced these regulations, which came into affect in April. The most significant of these, according to Klump, was that buyers now have to qualify for a five-year mortgage rate, although they'll be able to choose a lower variable rate once they qualify

"People who were looking to finance with a shorter term [mortgage] had to quality at the five-year advertised rate," Klump said, adding that, before April, buyers could qualify with a three-year rate. "The department of finance changed the rules because that way it provides them comfort that, when the mortgage comes due, [buyers] can afford to pay it off."

For Wagman, spring is always a busy season, regardless of tax and mortgage reform.

"Typically people always wait until the weather gets nice and the grass starts to show before listing their homes," he said.

Wagman has seen fewer bidding wars as the number of houses to choose from increases.

"The bidding wars have definitely subsided, however they do still happen and they happen primarily if the house is in a really good location and priced in a popular house range," he said.

"Basically, because more listings have come up and the talk about more listings coming in the media... people sort of start to draw back. [They think], 'If more's coming, we don't have to worry.' There's no panic to buy because there's no shortage coming."

This has left some sellers nervous as they wait for houses to sell. According to Wagman, a house usually takes an average of 60 days to sell.

"[People think] if the house doesn't sell in the first week, there's a problem, and that's really unfair to the house and to the market itself," he said.

Klump sees the market decreasing later in the year as the HST comes into affect, interest rates on mortgages increase and buyers get used to the new mortgage regulations.

Wagman is also anticipating fewer listings in the summer, but he doesn't see this as a problem.

"Things do typically slow down in the summer, but that's normal... most people are out of the city, buyers are taking a little break, there's usually not a lot of listings," he said, adding that the summer and winter is a good time for buyers because there's less competition.

"When people put their houses in the market in the summer, they're usually more eager to sell," he said.

No more shovels when you have a heated driveway

By JENNIFER LIBMAN
Special to The CJN

If there is one thing Canadians dread about winter it's shovelling their driveways. "People don't want to clean their driveways, or pay for shovelling," says Symcha Broot of Innovative Heated Driveways and Snow Melting Products. "But they need something or else they'll be stuck home all winter. Now, there's no more worrying about being snowed in."

Innovative Heated Driveways and Snow Melting Products (416-319-6240, info@drivewaysnowmelting.ca), which has been in Toronto for five years, inserts energy efficient snow melting cables directly into concrete, asphalt or mortar driveways that melt snow as soon as it lands.

"People can choose to have full coverage of their driveways, or just tire tracks. We can also accommodate unusually shaped driveways."

In addition to heated driveways, customers can also purchase heating mats that are placed on uncovered patios, walkways or stairs. "Homeowners and guests will no longer have to worry about navigating their way up icy stairs. This will save many accidents.

"Even when the weather is not co-operating, a heated patio can be an outdoor oasis, and we can design the system to provide full or partial coverage, depending on your needs and your budget."

Broot said that his company also takes care of roofs and gutters. "Ice and snow accumulating on your roof or inside your gutters can create costly water damage to your home or business. [Our] de-icing systems are equipped with a thermostat, sensor and de-icing cable to ensure that as ice and snow melt, there is a free pathway for water to drain properly."

Driveways start at around $10,000 and the cost of operating the system falls between $5.40 and $10.80 per snow fall, with most snowfalls ranging between three and six hours.

Financing is available, he said, and driveways can be installed during the spring and summer, so people can prepare for winter ahead of time.

It is an appliance emporium

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

One of the most thrilling ways to transform a home, whether you are a new or a longtime home-owner, is to purchase new appliances.

No matter the scale of your renovation, you will instantly feel renewed with the addition of a new stove, washer, dryer and even a new microwave! When looking to purchase such items, look no further than Caplan's Appliances (416-767-1655, www.caplans.ca).

Now in its third generation of family owners, Caplan's has come a long way since being founded by Herb Caplan in the 1930s. Today, the one-time downtown radio shop has become a high-end kitchen and laundry appliance emporium, serving customers in the GTA and beyond, with quality brands such as Miele KitchenAid, JennAir, Bosch, Dacor, Sub Zero, Wolf, GE Monogram, GE Café and Samsung. First passed on to Herb's son, Martin, and daughter-in-law, Fran, Caplan's is now managed by Herb's grandson, Robert.

Over the years, Caplan's has expanded into an impressive showroom that resembles three stores in one. The Caplan's original appliance store has been recently renovated with designer showrooms that feature all the top brands from Bosch and Dacor to KitchenAid and Wolf. As well, there is a large outlet area with new goods, manufacturers' overstock, end-of-line items and former floor models. Finally, there is a 3,000-square-foot gallery dedicated to Miele Appliances with a working kitchen, where delicious food is prepared by an on-site chef who also shares professional tips and recipes.

Caplan has a warm, friendly and no-pressure sales environment. Questions are not only welcomed but also encouraged.

"It is always helpful when a customer comes prepared with measurements, floor plans, colours, etc., especially if they are looking to renovate or remodel a large space, but if they don't have those details available as yet, our knowledgeable staff can certainly assist in helping customers find the right product," says Robert Caplan.

"Our staff is always ready to listen to the customer's unique needs before providing them with solutions that fit within their lifestyle and budget, and customer needs are taken seriously before, during and after the sales process."

Toronto's condominums outnumber city's co-ops by far

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

David Eichorn, the broker of record at David Eichorn Realty Ltd. (416-787-1712), says condominiums and co-ops, co-operatively owned apartments, share many common traits, but prospective-buyers should be aware of the differences in the ownership and financing.

Condominium owners own their units, but not the common areas of their buildings. These common elements such as the lobby and swimming pool, are owned by the condominium corporation, which also owns the land and manages the building, he says, noting that often the day-to-day management such as cleaning and concierge services, are contracted out to a property management company.

Co-op owners don't own their individual units, but rather own shares in the corporation that owns building, which he says is one of the big differences that affects sales of the units. "When you try to sell a condo unit, there are no restrictions as long as the parties abide by the rules and regulations of the condominium corporation."

However, the sale of a co-op unit requires the approval of the co-op owners. "The entire corporation has to vote you in."

According to Eichorn, financing and availability of units are the other two major differences between co-ops and condominiums. "The conventional financial institutions will not finance co-ops, so it's difficult to get a mortgage."

Often the purchase of a co-operative unit entails a larger down payment, he adds.

He says co-ops are usually older apartment buildings found in central or downtown Toronto, however, there are very few units in comparison to the number of condominiums.

David Eichorn

Indeed, the Toronto real estate board reports that of the 10,000 homes sold in March only 22 were co-op units.

Eichorn says in contrast to Toronto, New York City has more co-op housing than condominiums.

He stresses that price is another key difference between condos and co-operatives, pointing out that the latter are generally less expensive, but as investment tools they don't rise in value at the same rate as other housing stock.

Eichorn, who handles condominium resales, says a condition of a purchase offer, which is standard practice, is the provision by the seller of a status certificate, which can be reviewed by the buyer's lawyer.

The status certificate gives an update of the maintenance fees and taxes and the status of the reserve fund, and it will indicate whether or not the seller is in default of common expenses, he says.

"A portion of the maintenance fees are allocated to the reserve fund to make sure that there are adequate funds to pay for repairs of the common elements. If the fund gets depleted, all the unit owners undergo a special assessment to increase the reserve fund."

He says that the status certificate shows the anticipated costs of major repairs along with any outstanding litigation against the building. "If there is any human rights litigation, all the unit owners are responsible for the legal costs."

Many older buildings include utility costs in the monthly maintenance fees, he says.

"Newer buildings have separate meters for hydro and gas."

Eichorn has been a real estate broker since 1987 and founded his own company in 1994.

The company, which specializes in central Toronto, handles sales of new homes as well as resales, he says. "We provide a full array of services that includes introducing the clients to mortgage brokers who are more flexible than the major financial institutions.

"We also provide information about the renovation of older homes, by connecting our clients to home renovators and inspectors," he says.

"We pride ourselves on our boutique-style office whereby clients get very personalized service."

Residence or restaurant? To Constantia's happy family, it's both.

Too many cooks spoil the broth, goes the saying. At Constantia, exactly the opposite is true. In a state-of-the art kitchen, Food Services Manager Leon Oziel presides over a dedicated staff with a singular focus: putting food on your table that will make you kvell.

That's easier said than done when your "customers" are true food connoisseurs in their own right. "Most people fancy themselves experts on home cooking," laughs Oziel. "But our residents really are. They know the kitchen like the back of their hand, and they know how home cooking should taste. When I prepare a meal, I'm not just cooking for a crowd...I'm cooking for a dining room full of head chefs!"

In other words, multiply the task of satisfying both your mother and your mother-in-law by 150.

And you thought your job had pressure.

The reality, however, is that Oziel is his own harshest critic. "Perfectionism is ingrained in the chef's personality," he says. "Whether you're cooking for 10 or 150, it has to be perfect or you're not happy. That's why some chefs — not me, of course," he winks — "are known to be "moody" at times."

Shabbat dinner with all your favourites

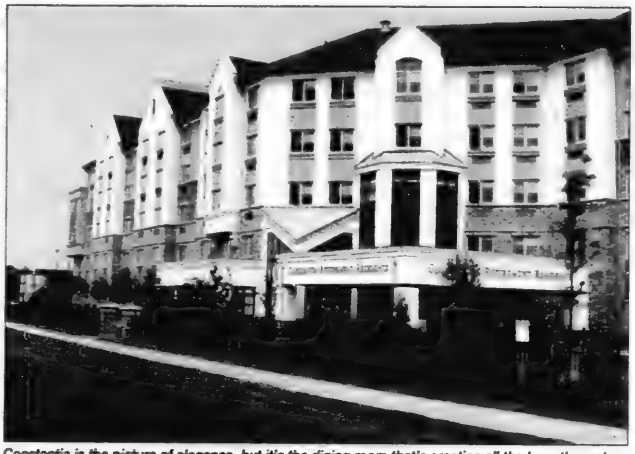
Recognizing the pivotal role played by food in facilitating the transition from home to retirement residence, Constantia recently hired Oziel with a view to taking their already-haymishe cuisine to a new level. To translate pressrelease-speak into plain English, that means putting the home back in home cooking.

Nowhere is this better exemplified that in Constantia's weekly Shabbat dinner. On any given Friday, this might include matzah ball chicken soup, gefilte fish, tzimmes, roast chicken, beef brisket — you name it, Constantia's table has it, made from scratch, just like Mother's.

In addition to the mouthwatering daily dining and weekly Shabbat extravaganzas, residents enjoy traditional specialty foods for the holidays. Latkes and souvganyot for Chanukah — kugel and matzah brown at Pesach — if it's in your culinary consciousness, it's on Constantia's menu.

Since Oziel's arrival, every meal at Constantia has become an event — a festive occasion eagerly anticipated by residents. Bookend the pleasure of each meal with the forspeis of anticipation and the afterglow that only home cooking can provide, and you're connecting the day's dots in the tastiest possible way.

For Oziel, satisfying his discerning clientele isn't just a job, it's a labour of love. "Cooking is my passion," he exudes. "The feedback I get is something money can't buy." That feedback, he says, is sometimes direct, sometimes indirect. "It makes my day when residents tell me how much they love a particular dish, but when they fill up the dining room before the food is even served — and linger on long afterwards — that speaks volumes too."



Constantia is the picture of elegance, but it's the dining room that's creating all the buzz these days

Looking every bit the gourmet in his starched chef's hat, Oziel has a résumé to match, with stints at the Windsor Arms Hotel and a number of other prestigious dining establishments. But after serving the who's who of Toronto's high society for two decades, Constantia "feels like home", he says. "I now have the most knowledgeable and appreciative clientele in Toronto," he beams. "It's any chef's dream."

Regardless of where you're from, Oziel has your gustatory bases covered with a repertoire that knows no geographic boundaries. From borscht to blintzes, cabbage rolls to kreplach, fricassee to stuffed peppers — you'll eat it here in good health.

Being of Moroccan origin, Oziel has a flair for traditional Middle Eastern dishes such as couscous and falafel. Like most of his specialties, their popularity among Constantia's residents is off the charts.

But the lunch and supper offerings aren't the only fare that whet appetites at Constantia. Here, even breakfast is an event. If you need any incentive to get out of bed, Oziel's heavenly morning spreads are it.

How big an incentive?

Big enough to cause 8 a.m. "traffic jams" in the dining area, says Marketing Manager Jennifer Brinder. "Our residents deserve more than making do with a "basic breakfast," she smiles. "It can be simple if you like, but it can also be elaborate." Echoes General Manager Lynne Colman, "You can go an entire week without eating the same breakfast twice." Residents with fond memories of hotel-style service in Miami and other vacations destinations will experience virtually the same dining ambience and variety at Constantia. "It's like having your own private chef," says Colman.

Even for dessert, gourmet-restaurant refinement and largesse prevail. Seasonal fresh fruit is used extensively, not only in compotes but also in such delectables as apple and peach pies baked in house. This bounty also finds its way into seasonal events such as Constantia's ever-popular strawberry social. "Dessert is not an afterthought," says Brinder. "We serve our residents as if they were guests in our own home — because they are."

With summer fast approaching, Constantians are already gearing up for the BBQ season and the opportunity to enjoy many of their favourite foods hot off the grill — either in the dining room or, weather and space permitting, on the elegant patio.

Home isn't really "home" without home cooking

Compiling your retirement residence wish list? At Constantia, it goes something like this:

- Exquisite accommodations? Check.
- State-of-the-art amenities? Check.
- First-class recreational and exercise programs? Check.
- Caring, attentive staff? Check.
- Holiday observance? Check.
- Food that tastes like you've never left home, prepared by a chef so good you'd give him the keys to your kitchen? Check, check, exclamation point.

Let's eat!

Retirement homes places of solace, friendship

Whenever a resident moves into a retirement home, they bring with them their own history, culture and personality. The result is a rich mosaic, and there are inevitably many heart-warming stories to share.

A sampling of retirement homes have shared some of these stories:

At Constantia Retirement Residence, a case of mistaken mail delivery has a happy ending.

Who hasn't, at one time or another, received a letter addressed to someone else? Although this can be a hassle, at Constantia Retirement Residence sometimes the wrong address is the right one.

Consider the case of residents Rose Caplin and Dorothy Bellack. One day Rose received a letter addressed to Dorothy and returned it to the front desk. Dorothy had been expecting the letter for some time and wanted to know who returned it so she could thank them personally.

Rose and Dorothy met and a friendship developed that endures to this day. They now enjoy socializing together, having tea, playing Rummy Q and going on outings.

* * *

Dr. David Shaul, who lives at Dunfield Retirement Residence, says "I did some research before settling on the Dunfield. For me it wasn't just about living longer, but about living well. I was looking for an active and stimulating environment that gives me the same kind of choice and variety I've enjoyed throughout my life. I think I've found that in the Dunfield. This is a retirement lifestyle I can look forward to."

* * *

The staff at Amica at Thornhill often encounter feel good moments. Following are two such stories:

Amica once had a client whose daughter came to them in tears, saying she was worried for her mother living alone in a huge home. Her zest for life was gone and she felt isolated and lonely. However, the thought of changing her lifestyle and moving to a retirement community was too farfetched for her. As a courtesy to her daughter, she did visit Amica, but left feeling overwhelmed.

The option of a trial stay was suggested, and within two days into the trial stay, her daughter said it had been a long time since she had seen her mother so happy.

Another client came to Amica in rough shape. Out of the hospital with a hip replacement, she came to Amica at Thornhill in a wheelchair. Armed with the motivation to get better, but lacking the strength, she knew she would walk again but didn't know when this would happen.

The Wellness and Vitality team immediately got started on strengthening her body and mind and preparing her for a life of mobility, activity and health. With a program specifically developed with her needs and abilities in mind, she made strides above and beyond anyone's expectations. Today this resident is one of Amica at Thornhill's most dynamic, actively participating on various committees and boards within the Jewish community.

Grand, uplifting and inspiring are not necessarily the first words you'd associate with a retirement residence, unless you're Eva Davies and your new home motivated you to give art lessons to your fellow residents.

"I didn't plan for it or expect it. I just found Delmanor Northtown uplifting from the outset, and one thing led to another," says Davies.

Her background in visual arts started right out of high school with her first job illustrating Captain Marvel comics. She has since had one-person art shows in Canada and the United States.

None of her students had any art experience. With the support of staff and Eva's encouragement, the course was up and running. One of her students — fellow resident Elvie — became such an apt pupil that her enthusiasm became a full-blown passion. In just two months she's turned her one-bedroom suite into a mini art gallery. She and the other students recently hosted a very successful "Young at Art" show.

By definition, respite care is a response to an unwelcome condition or event. In one particularly poignant case, L'chaim Retirement Home's founder Judy Cohen welcomed a new resident under particularly difficult circumstances. Hard-pressed to cope with his wife's cancer — the prognosis for which was not favourable — this gentleman came to L'chaim under duress far harsher than any malady of his own could have occasioned.

An elderly couple enjoying their retirement

But miracles do happen — and in this case, one did. His wife survived and joined him at L'chaim, where they now live and continue to enjoy the pleasure of each other's company. "How's that for a second honeymoon?" says Cohen. "Forget about winning the lottery...this is what life is all about."

* * *

Margaret Darte, one of Hazelton Place's longstanding residents, is 90 per cent blind. Margaret, though, has ears like a hawk and a heart as big as an elephant's. She often answers questions from visitors or calms upset residents.

Her history has given her the strength and character so appreciated by so many. Having lost a daughter who was tragically killed, she helped develop the Bereaved Families group and returned to school for her master's degree at age 55.

* * *

At Forest Hill Retirement Home, a staff member said, my favourite feel good moment is when someone comes in who is apprehensive or uncertain about retirement living then they get integrated within our community and discover the warmth and compassion that exudes.

A resident said that " I was apprehensive about the idea of moving into retirement living but the warmth and compassion that surrounds me at Forest Hill Place has allowed me to feel at home."

* * *

Our favourite feel good moment was when two residents who met at Terrace Gardens and fell in love, approached the executive director, Yoav Bohbot, to ask if he would be able to help them plan their wedding to be held at the residence. Our staff at Terrace Gardens was honoured to help them find a rabbi and assist in planning their day.

* * *

The moment I was introduced to Thorne Mill on Steeles Senior Residence the social environment was very appealing and made me realize what I had been missing. Can you imagine, I was given a personalized house warming party for my friends and family and what a memorable evening it was. The most precious moment was seeing my longtime childhood friend Sara and knowing that she too lives at Thorne Mill on Steeles. Great memories to come.

Condo in the heart of Jewish Toronto

By JENNIFER LIBMAN
Special to The CJN

The Deloraine Residences (416-783-4431) on Bathurst Street between Wilson and Lawrence avenues, is the ideal location right in the heart of Jewish life, says construction manager Eli Ronen.

The 23-unit building offers 13 different floor plans. The units range in size from 900 square feet to more than 1,600 square feet and are available with one, two or three bedrooms. There are also a number of two-story penthouse suites.

Owners of these residences will live luxuriously, with nine-foot ceilings, optional hardwood floors throughout the living areas and stone flooring at the suites' entrance, he said.

Deloraine residences

Kitchens can be customized with choices of cabinetry, stone counters and backsplash and are equipped with a double stainless sink, with an optional second sink available. Units include a frost-free refrigerator with water and ice dispensers, a self-cleaning oven with an optional gas connection to the stove, as well as a built-in dishwasher. All appliances are stainless steel.

Ronen said owners can design their bathrooms with choices of ceramic tiling for the floor and surrounding of the shower and bathtub. There is a custom vanity with under-counter sink, an integrated medicine cabinet mirror and lighting fixture as well as the option for a Jacuzzi tub.

Residents will also enjoy the other amenities in the building, including storage lockers, a party room and a fitness centre. The building is equipped with two elevators, one of which is a Shabbat elevator. Each unit includes a parking spot.

The building is just minutes from a wide variety of shopping and dining options, including restaurants and shops on Avenue Road, as well as in Lawrence Plaza and Yorkdale Shopping Centre. Residents are also close by to a number of schools and synagogues, as well as Jewish stores. It's located right on a TTC bus route and close to Wilson station.

The units will be ready for move-in this summer, and some are still available starting from $460,000.

'Tis the season of bathroom and kitchen renovation

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

'Tis the season of renovation, and to help you on your search for renovators, plumbers, showrooms and parts, we've rounded up three of Toronto's most trusted sources.

On your search for plumbing, alterations, installations or even complete bathroom and kitchen renovations, look no further than Lampert Plumbing (416-787-4921, www.lampertrenovations.com).

Lampert is a one-stop shop. Started by Joseph Lampert, an iron and metal worker who immigrated to Canada from Russia, and his son, Hyman, the company began in plumbing and heating but split into two different endeavours when the two disagreed over the longevity of the copper pipe.

Hyman started his own company in the 1940s fresh off of serving in the air force in World War II, and after years of improvements and shifts, that company has become Lampert Plumbing Systems Inc., Lampert Renovations Ltd. and Lampert Bath Liners Plus. It's operated by Joseph's grandchildren and Hy's sons, Arthur and Lawrence Lampert.

Specializing in all manners of kitchen and bathroom renovation as well as plumbing repairs, Lampert is one of only two companies in Toronto that offer bathtub and wall acrylic lining systems.

"Not only can we rough in the plumbing for your bathroom, we can also put up the walls, tile, or put up acrylic," says Arthur Lampert.

Sophie's Landing: waterside club living in Orillia

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

What if you could have it all? French Village living on the shores of Lake Simcoe. A cottage retreat within an exclusive, secure community. Your own personal marina, less than two hours from Toronto. Recreational activities for the younger crowd, along with quiet trails and privacy. Wouldn't you jump at the opportunity?

Catering to the baby boomer crowd of working professionals seeking either a weekend retreat or a future retirement paradise, Signature Carleton president Eric Kerzner calls Sophie's Landing, his company's newest resort community, ideal for a "cottage or four-season getaway."

"There's nothing else like it." You know that's true when you visit the community and find yourself speaking not to a slick professional agent but to a potential future neighbour.

"We use actual purchasers who live there," in the sales centre, Kerzner says. Who better to share the many advantages of this exciting new development?

With fishing, boating, rollerblading, biking, waterfront and social activities close at hand to this community of high-end fully-detached bungalows, you may be tempted to make Sophie's Landing your "stay-cation" hot spot.

But should you choose to go further afield, you'll easily find everything you need just minutes from the gates of Sophie's Landing. With 20,000 permanent residents – swelling to 50,000 in the summer – the city of Orillia offers a range of big-box stores, as well as 24-hour grocery shopping, golf courses, restaurants and, of course, its idyllic waterfront.

"It's a boaters' paradise," says Kerzner. "It's just west of The Narrows, where Lake Simcoe meets Lake Couchiching."

As part of the Trent-Severn Waterway, boaters could even travel down the St. Lawrence River as far as Florida, if they desired. "We're the only gated waterfront community in Ontario."

"People can use it as a cottage or a chalet and they don't have to maintain anything. It's all done for you." With a maintenance-free lifestyle, Sophie's Landing is perfect for those who still have career committments back in in the city.

"It's also very secure, because it's gated," says Kerzner. "It's ideal for snowbirds who leave it for six months. They don't have to worry about it."

A boomer himself, Kerzner named the development after his youngest child, daughter Sophie. Sophie's Landing consists of two phases: Phase 1, which is completely built and occupied already, and Phase 2, which is nearly 85 per cent sold, and 75 per cent built.

A few lots are still available, but Kerzner believes they'll go fast. "We saved our best units for last."

The community's 84 custom bungalows all boast high-end architecture and premium touches, such as standard nine-foot ceilings, steep rooflines and choices of Muskoka or French country design finishes. "We don't want all the houses to look the same."

Starting at $369,000, Kerzner says, "this is a high-end community… the houses that come standard do not need to be upgraded at all."

Optional upgrades have been very popular, however, which Kerzner credits to Signature Carleton's extremely fair pricing structure.

Each of the twelve base models can be customized to a purchaser's needs, although they do include many wonderful touches, such as the standard attached garage and private drive for one or two cars.

"Most of the customizing we do doesn't cost anything," says Kerzner. "Moving walls and stuff like that costs us next to nothing." When something more extensive is requested, such as upgrading the kitchen to hardwood or finishing the basement, Signature Carleton will do it for an unheard-of "cost plus 20 per cent" formula. "It's really affordable to customize… our buyers love the opportunity to personalize their homes."

Kerzner says most buyers are choosing to build an optional spacious loft, and even expand the second floor, for one simple reason: "People get a lot of visitors up there," he says. "There's so much to do."

Sophie's Landing

"Orillia is a dream for tourism," Kerzner adds. With summertime festivals, wintertime skiing and Casino Rama five minutes away, you'll never be bored. And when you want to stay closer to home, two fireside lounges, saltwater pools, a kids' playroom, waterside patio, or the rooftop terrace with remote-control miniature boats offer plenty of options.

"There's nothing missing," he says.

Based in Toronto, Signature Carleton has a 30-year track record building quality hotels, resorts, lifestyle communities as well as custom homes within the GTA. "Comparing [Sophie's Landing to buying] a house would not be a fair comparison… people understand that it's really the lifestyle they're buying."

In other words, there really is a place that you can have it all.

For more information or to make an appointment to view the community first-hand, visit SophiesLanding.ca or contact Kerzner directly at 416-624-3742.

Social supports revitalize neighbourhood

By STEPHEN SWEET
Special to The CJN

In an area with a bad reputation, one set of properties is slowly starting to change attitudes around.

The San Romanoway revitalization program is an initiative that looks to increase safety as well as provide cultural and social enrichment programs for adults and children, has made a difference in one community.

The properties just north of Finch Avenue West and east of Jane Street were targeted by a study that broke down some of the area's most significant problems.

"Looking at the survey, there was a definite need to look at social issues that were causing such ill within the neighbourhood," said Stephnie Payne, the program's associate director.

"We looked and decided that there needed to be some social support programs in here to give residents a sense of belonging and a sense of ownership."

Beginning modestly with a recreation centre in the basement of one building, the program continued to grow, thanks to government grants and hard work.

"We've got various supports in place," Payne said. "We have an in-house social worker that does individual, group, and domestic violence counselling.

"We also have an active senior program with 68 seniors weekly, as well as a breakfast and after-school program for the children, including a four-food-group meal prepared in-house for dinner."

Getting the younger generations to find alternative sources of entertainment and stay out of trouble is an integral part of the program's social aspect.

"We have a youth program that is driven and led by youths," Payne said. "It gets the kids engaged in activities and staying out of the stairwells or from participating in anti-social behaviour.

"They're provided a space where they've got a recording studio, as well as a lounge with a television and Xbox."

As of right now, there are no vacancies at 25 San Romanoway, an absolute rarity in this area.

"What we do has to make business sense, and in the case of this project, it does," said Robert Weiman, vice-president of corporate development for Greenwin Property Management, the company that is in charge of the building.

Greenwin's San Romanoway

"There is very little turnover in this building, and with no vacancy, we don't have to reduce our rents for our building in order to fill it."

According to Weiman, normal vacancy rates usually hover around six per cent, but in that area, it can be much higher. This positive situation is a benefit for both the property managers and clients alike.

"The building is able to run with lower operating costs," Weiman said. "When that happens, it makes for a greater return on the investment for the owner, and as a result, ownership value goes up."

Weiman believes that this in turn has helped to lead to a sense of pride for those who reside at 25 San Romanoway, as they take advantage of the programs available to them while living at such a desirable location.

"It's really interesting to go there and see it or walk through the building," Weiman said. "You see the cleanliness of the building. There's no graffiti, no vandalism."

That acts as a major reason why the building is the lone one in that area to have gained certification status from the Fair Rental Policy Organization, having passed several necessary hurdles of quality living in order to do so.

Things have improved greatly in the San Romanoway area.

"The issue of gang-related violence, we don't see it here anymore," Payne said. "We don't see drugs being dealt openly like we did before.

"People are not scared anymore."

The Fountains 'sets a new standard in condo living'

There is much to fall in love with in the city of Vaughan, the city above Toronto.

Mere minutes from downtown Toronto, communities north of Steeles Avenue, including Vaughan, have enjoyed a tremendous boom in recent years.

With an abundance of green spaces, a variety of local entertainment and leisure options, a myriad of stores, boutiques, restaurants, bars and cafés, and a variety of single family residential developments and cutting-edge condominium projects, Vaughan and its neighbourhoods, such as Thornhill, are considered among the best places to live, work and play anywhere in the GTA.

"The 905 is a dynamic, vibrant part of the Greater Toronto Area," says Shawn Richardson of Liberty Development, an award-winning condominium developer specializing in residential and mixed-use master planned communities in Markham, Vaughan, Richmond Hill and Thornhill and other GTA neighbourhoods.

Among Liberty's most successful projects are the celebrated Markham Centre and Liberty Square; the highly successful World on Yonge mixed use development; and the Thornhill City Centre, a condominium community on Bathurst Street just south of the 407 Highway.

"Thornhill City Centre is one of the 905's most ambitious residential developments, on one of its best locations," says Shawn Richardson. "Just north of the Promenade Centre and the dynamic new commercial developments along Centre Street, Thornhill City Centre is a multi-phased 25-acre residential development that includes the city of Vaughan's first urban park – a five-acre green space called Thornhill Green.

The Fountains at Thornhill City Centre

"Surrounding the park is a residential community that boasts 61 elegant townhomes and approximately 1,300 suites in six condominium buildings. That number, however, is set to rise with the release of our next residential opportunity, an 18-storey contemporary condo tower called The Fountains at Thornhill City Centre."

Designed by architect Cliff Korman of Kirkor Architects, The Fountains will offer well-designed, livable and elegantly appointed suites that range in size from 565 square feet to 1,200 square feet. Each suite will feature designer-inspired standard finishes, including laminate flooring throughout the living and dining areas, nine-foot ceiling heights and expansive balconies. All units offer a custom gourmet kitchen that includes granite slab countertops, stainless steel appliances, and European designed cabinetry. The master ensuites will boast marble countertops, deep soaker tubs and contemporary white fixtures.

Amenities at The Fountains will include a state-of-the-art fitness facility featuring a fully equipped training gym, an indoor pool and whirlpool, his and her change rooms, and sauna. Other features and amenities include a media screening room, billiards room, party room and an indoor golf simulator.

The Fountains at Thornhill City Centre is located just minutes from public transit via VIVA, York Region Transit and the TTC. With convenient access to public transit, getting around the region will be easy, while The Fountains' proximity to highways 407, 400 and the 404 will make it easy to get just about anywhere in the GTA.

"From our unsurpassed location, high-level finishes and our dynamic lifestyle features, The Fountains sets a new standard in condo living – not just for the 905, but for the GTA, too," says Richardson. "We think The Fountains will make quite a splash in today's condo market."

For more information about The Fountains, call 905-731-8302. The presentation centre is at at 7890 Bathurst St. www.thefountaincondos.com.

company . "The grandchildren of some of our first clients are now coming to us," says Linda Schatzky.

Tom Schatzky cites the many benefits of renovating with glass. "Frameless glass shower doors and enclosures are the finishing touch, the pièce de résistance to any bathroom, which will help you maintain an open feel to your bathroom while creating the shower of your dreams," he says.

"Bathtub and shower doors are the practical and affordable alternative to shower curtains. Whether a single stall door or a tub door, there are a number of glass styles with a variety of decorative frame finishes to fit any décor and budget. All our doors are available for pick up by contractors or those do-it-yourselfers out there, or you can have one of experienced technicians install it.

"Frameless glass showers have become a large part of our business, but glass dividers/partitions and glass railings have become extremely popular as well," says Schatzky.

If you are searching for plumbing fixtures and bath products, visit Taps at one of its two GTA locations (416-785-0224 in Toronto, 905-569-1262 in Mississauga, www.tapsbath.com). With more than 10,000 different products representing more than 200 manufacturers from around the globe, including Kohler, American Standard, Dornbracht, Franke, Hansgrohe, Grohe, Maax and Blanco, there's no better place to shop than Taps Bath Centre.

While you're visiting, check out the well-stocked Bath Boutique. You'll find towel bars and hardware to co-ordinate with faucet designs and finishes. Towels in a rainbow of colours are plentiful, along with towel warmers, mirrors and an exotic array of lotions and scents. Finishing touches are a Taps specialty.

While you navigate through the endless and stunning selection offered, the Taps' knowledgeable creative consultants will help you with any concerns you may have, as well as informing you of all the newest and latest products, such as this tip: most old toilets take a 13-litre flush. A few years ago six lpf (litres per flush) toilets were introduced to save thousands of litres of water each year. With the new 4.8 lpf high-efficiency toilets, one can be a true water conservationist. Some municipalities, including the City of Toronto and Peel region, offer a $60 to $75 rebate for replacing each old toilet with a new water-conserving model.

In its 26th year of business, Taps has become the largest dealer in Canada for many supplies, which allows for a cost savings to be passed on to the customer. Whatever your budget, you'll discover an endless selection of ideas to wash, pamper and invigorate.

Condo complex combines urban living with nature

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Terry Lustig isn't building a condo complex. She's building a community.

Lustig, the development and marketing manager of Gramercy Park, a new 512-unit condominium complex, sees the development as an important change to the Wilson Heights area of Downsview.

"It's really the first new development happening in the area," Lustig said. "It's going to be a really nice community. I think we're paving the way for new development in the area. We're setting the bar as a new place to live."

Construction for Phase 1 of Gramercy Park, which is located on Wilson Avenue near the Yorkdale Shopping Centre, will start next month. The first phase will have 265 units and should be finished by late 2011. Construction for Phase 2, called Union Square, should start late this year and be completed by fall of 2012.

For Lustig, the complex's area, which is close to the Wilson subway on the Spadina line and to the highway, is ideal. Especially for those buying their first condo.

"We call ourselves the best value on the subway. For a young couple starting out, this is a great place to start," she said. "You have the convenience of the subway, immediate amenities in the area. Also, you've got really easy access to the highway... You can be almost anywhere in the GTA in under 20 minutes."

The condos themselves come in different packages. The complex's most popular plan is their one bedroom plus den.

The Trillium, another plan, is larger, at 1,382 square feet and a 677 square-foot terrace.

Buyers can also get the Sage plan, which has a ground floor patio and direct access from the street. Condo prices range from $190,000 to $500,000.

"Because it's not downtown, we're able to offer [the suites] at a much more affordable price than downtown condos," Lustig said.

"We just think it's a great package. It's real value. The suites are finished nicely, they come with six appliances, we have nice flooring."

Each suite will have granite counters in the kitchen, laminate European flooring and parking.

The complex itself was inspired by a similar space in New York, which is described on Gramercy Park's website as a "tranquil green space designed and built for the exclusive enjoyment of the privileged few."

In an effort to combine urban life with this concept, the building includes a park, which will be half-an-acre large.

"The private park has wonderful outdoor amenities," Lustig said. The park will include shaded walkways and park benches.

The building will also have the Gramercy Club. The club will have a lobby with 24-hour concierge service, an indoor swimming pool, a fitness centre, yoga room, party facilities, home theatre and a private dining room and kitchen.

"We even have a pet spa," Lustig said. "There are lots of people who have a single cat or small dog and we didn't want them to be excluded."

Newlyweds choose housing that suits needs

By ELAINE COHEN
Special to The CJN

Choosing living quarters is more complicated for today's young couples because of the two-career setup. In former years, the groom's choice took priority because the couple depended on the groom's financial future. Therefore, if he were to pursue studies out-of-town or accept a job in the outskirts of town, his spouse followed his path without complaint.

Few wives worked full-time until their children started school. Government subsidized daycare was non-existent and often it didn't pay to hire someone to take care of the children. Furthermore, society accepted the fact a woman's place was in the home. Now the situation for women has improved and her place in the family structure has been elevated to the extent a groom must take his bride's career needs into consideration before making decisions on living quarters. Being near her career venue is equally important.

Couples pursuing studies on a budget

Many bright young brides and grooms are pursuing graduate degrees leading to professions that include many years of study and training before they build their respective practices. However, by the time they are in their mid or late 20s, they decide it's time to get married and so they proceed to rent modest premises. Although it's possible to spend a lot of time in libraries and to work on space-saving laptops, many couples prefer to study in the privacy of their respective dwellings. Problems arise when they are confined to tiny apartments without personal desk, drawer and shelf space for texts, related reference materials and digital gizmos. Therefore, it's important to take space allocation into consideration before signing a lengthy lease.

Renting a home or apartment

Renting premises with an extra room and garden space is a viable solution for couples who marry after they are entrenched in careers but unsure of plans for the future. If they do start their family, they won't have to move immediately. Similarly, if their work venue changes, they can sublet and vacate the premises without having to worry about selling it. Furthermore, by continuing to work, they will be able to build up their bank account to buy a home once their family increases.

Buying a first home

Finding an appropriate first home begins with a price range and a brief list of desirable neighbourhoods. Nevertheless, there are many other factors, the couple needs to consider before investing in what could be their best asset. The couple should try to figure out their mutual priorities to narrow down their search. Here are some pointers to consider.

Location: Is it near work, school, synagogue, shopping, family, friends, green space, recreation and health facilities and other young families.

Safety: Is the neighborhood safe and do you feel comfortable and welcome in that locale?

Financial: Can you afford the taxes, down-payment, mortgage, maintenance, repairs and emergencies that inevitably occur?

Upkeep: Can you afford the utilities, that is heating, air conditioning, electricity, and water taxes? Are you able to undertake simple repairs and maintenance duties yourselves or do you have to engage outside help? Do you intend to mow the lawn, weed the garden and cut bushes? Would you consider clearing snow during the long winter months? Are you handy doing chores that require tinkering with plaster, paint, brushes, electric drills, hammers, pliers and screwdrivers? Can you repair a dripping tap or toilet flusher? If not, remember to factor how much it will cost to pay respective service people to do the job.

Are you buying a starter home as an investment hoping to build equity to upgrade in the future?

Have you consulted an accountant, lawyer or real estate professional about using your RRSP toward the purchase of your first home? Can you afford the mortgage and upkeep? Would you be in financial straits if one or both of you lost your job?

Check it out: Before agreeing to purchase a home, check it out. Hire an objective, reputable engineer and housing inspector to check the plumbing, wiring and all the structural components in every part of the home and on the entire property.

Condos may not include the same costs as a house but they do entail association fees.

Wigston Green Estates offers luxury and privacy

Welcome home to Wigston Green Estates by Broadway Homes, a luxurious and exclusive enclave of estate residences within the prestigious community of Thornhill in the vicinity of Bathurst Street and Highway 7.

With only 17 home sites, Wigston Green Estates offers future homeowners a rare opportunity to enjoy luxury in a fantastic location. Each home site consists of 60- or 80-foot lots offering privacy and a canvas to satisfy even the most sophisticated landscaping vision.

Enjoy luxury in a fantastic location

The spectacular home plans reflect old world charm and architecture with distinctive stone and stucco exteriors, front porticos with copper roofs, balconies, covered terraces and triple car (some underground) garages.

The interiors are best described as lavish. The imposing front doors lead gracefully into a double-height foyer, further enhanced by the 10-foot main floor ceilings and extended-height passage doors. Elegance and character abound with staircases leading from the basement to the second or even third floor loft, not to mention the additional convenience of secondary service staircases and elevators, depending on model type.

Each residence features a formal dining room and living room; an open-concept great room with a fireplace and a library/office with traditional waffle ceiling.

The professional chef-inspired kitchens are sure to impress with massive islands, breakfast bars, gas-ready stovetops and built-in wall ovens and microwaves, as per plan. Homeowners will have the opportunity to customize and personalize their kitchens so it truly becomes the heart of their homes.

The second level of the home boasts nine-foot ceilings. The master retreats are breathtaking while the remaining three or four bedrooms each have private baths, as per model selected.

The success of Wigston Green Estates lies in the key elements of quality, attention to detail, design and service. The magnificent estate setting is a testament to the team of creative minds working together to develop architecturally significant homes that truly reflect the elements of style, personality and tradition.

The success of Broadway Homes is that their homes are built not only as lasting investments but are the collaboration of creative minds working together to develop superior homes that truly reflect their clients' style and personality. Every home they build is crafted with premium materials, premium workmanship and premium service.

Wigston Green Estates is scheduled to open the summer of 2010. To pre-register and receive priority information on the release of this spectacular site, email contact information to Michelle.L@remingtonhomes.com.

Baby furniture is an investment in your child

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

If you're expecting a baby, it's time to prepare for his or her arrival. Buying the necessary furniture, gear and accessories can seem overwhelming, especially for new mothers, but if you turn to the experts for help, the task won't be such a challenge.

It's important to realize that baby furniture is an investment for you and your child. You are going to want to purchase pieces that will be sturdy, long lasting and stylish. Because the nursery is where you and your baby will be spending a great deal of time, the room should be a place designed in a practical and pleasing manner.

When you start looking for baby furniture, you will find a large variety of choices. Dear-Born Baby and Kiddiesworld of Furniture, two reputable providers of baby-related items in the GTA, are popular among customers for their vast selections. Both stores offer thousands of baby products with a goal to give parents an exceptional retail experience.

Budget, style, comfort and safety are among the important factors that parents should consider while on their shopping mission. Jerry White, owner of Kiddiesworld of Furniture (www.kiddiesworld.ca, 905-624-9092), says his 13,000 square-foot Mississauga store has over 90 cribs in the showroom along with matching bedding, more than six brands of strollers, an extensive supply of car seats, highchairs and gliders that would fit any customer's criteria.

When White opened Kiddiesworld in 1980, he says he felt there was a need for a specialty store that could give the clientele a level of personal service they couldn't get elsewhere. He says his staff are very knowledgeable and can answer any questions – whether it's the differences in car seats for both infants or toddlers, regulations for cribs, or how to fold and unfold strollers. "There is a lot for a parent to know and you want to shop where experience counts."

White says strollers are among his store's best sellers. Stroller and car seat combinations are in high demand, especially when the car seat is mandatory for the first six months. He says another "hot" item is the crib to bed convertible, which can be used for the first two 1/2 to three years as a crib and then converted into a double bed.

Rent-a-Son keeps it in the family

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

When Dustin Kroft, president of Rent-a-Son, started his business 10 years ago, he would drive around the city in the company vehicle, amazed at the random people who laughed, waved, or even rolled down their windows to ask: 'What is Rent-a-Son?'

The answer, he says, is quite simple: Rent-a-Son provides an affordable hourly service to home and business owners who need help with organizing, moving, house cleaning, gardening or yard work and other manual labour jobs.

Back in June 2000, Kroft and three of his friends decided to do something "positive and enterprising" during their university summer break. After one long, hot day of gardening for a friend's mother, Kroft says he discovered his calling. "It was then that the idea of providing sons for anyone who needed some physical work done around the house was born. Shortly after came the name Rent-a-Son."

Kroft says he began hiring students to perform the work that a son would usually be asked to do.

"Whether it was cutting the grass, cleaning out the garage, painting or helping with the family move, we wanted to provide homeowners with hard-working personable staff that felt like family."

He says a lot of the 'sons' enjoy the chores they do "because they get to work with their hands and because it is a nice escape from the mundane nine to five desk job." One of Rent-a-Son's "specialties" is their internal or in-house moving service, where movers can help arrange furniture, organize storage lockers and units, lift heavy items, pack or unpack items and do small deliveries in their minivan.

Equally as popular is Rent-a-Son's labour service, which can range from cleaning brass pots to ripping out carpet to carrying and installing drywall. The 'sons' will even assist customers with their gardening and yard needs, including planting, weeding, trimming hedges, digging and laying patio stones. Kroft says spring is their busiest season, as "people are always excited about getting the exterior of their homes ready for the nice weather."

Over the past decade, Rent-a-Son has grown into a supplier of various labour and maintenance services to homeowners and businesses across the GTA and now throughout London, Ontario. Ranging in size from 25 to 45 'sons' at any given time, the team has helped over 4,000 clients in the past seven years. Kroft attributes the company's success to the positive and diligent experiences that the 'sons' offer customers, and says they "truly are the muscle behind this business."

Since Rent-a-Son's conception, Kroft says one thing has remained constant: "great staff who make you feel comfortable in your own home." He says every 'son' is screened and hand picked by the company, insured, personable and almost always available for next-day service. All of the 'sons' are trained to ensure they are familiar with the tasks they may be asked to complete, as the company does not outsource or sub-contract work out to anyone.

Although a prerequisite for potential new employees is physical agility and strength, Kroft says he focuses on the attitude and demeanour of his candidates. "We do not bring any tools or equipment with us to the jobs — just our hands and a willingness to tackle every one of your requests with determination and care." He says the feedback from clients is very positive, with many comments touching on the personalities of the 'sons.' Customers tend to grow attached to the 'sons' they hire after spending a day with them around the house.

Kroft says Rent-a-Son's goal is to provide "unsurpassed service in all aspects at affordable rates." An hour of work costs $50, two hours costs $75 and three hours costs $88.50. Every additional hour is $29.50. Rent-a-Son offers custom pricing to regular (weekly or biweekly) customers, higher volume customers and temporary labour clients.

For more information on Rent-a-Son, visit their website at www.rentason.ca or call 416-913-9021 or 1-866-999-2766.

Find most of your baby needs under one roof

When buying a crib, he says, safety should never be compromised. "You shouldn't buy a crib that includes a mattress. You get what you pay for, and if you're paying nothing for a mattress it's not what you want for your child. Don't skimp on the crib, the car seat or the stroller. These items are used and abused for a long time by the children and you don't want to have to replace them."

A safe crib can be priced anywhere from $399 to $999, with the main differences being style-related and whether or not it converts to a bed for longer use. Buying quality is a worthwhile investment, he says, as one set can take your child from infancy to university. If cost is a concern, Kiddiesworld has a clearance section with "ends of lines" and "one only" products including cribs, beds, dressers and gliders.

Also known for their quality baby furniture and gear is Dear-Born Baby (905-881-3334) located in Thornhill. Established over 30 years ago by owner Cathy Scott, the retail store carries specialty and brand names in cribs, dressers, beds, linens, strollers and car seats. Their online site (www.dearbornbaby.com) gives customers the option to shop from home, with the confidence of knowing that Dear-Born Baby services what they sell. The store ships across North America, providing all the must-have items for today's savvy parents.

Dear-Born Baby is the place to find all the best products to make parenting convenient, rewarding and enjoyable, says Lindsay Stephenson, the store's marketing director. "Not only will you find everything you need for your baby, our specialty services include professional car seat installations, stroller tune-ups and repairs, furniture touch-ups, rentals and more. We pride ourselves on being a full-service baby store."

Stephenson says that families today are looking for nursery furniture that has "longevity, durability as well as great design." Like Kiddiesworld, Dear-Born Baby sells the convertible crib and models with modern features – clean lines and darker finishes, such as espresso, that match the home's interior. She says the modular stroller is also popular for its multi functions - the bassinet and car seat adapter for when the baby is a newborn and a stroller seat for when the child is bigger.

Dear-Born showroom

Since Dear-Born Baby is committed to educating customers on products that are right for their individual needs, the company has created an online blog (www.dearbornbaby.blogspot.com) that is constantly updated with product reviews, announcements and tips for new parents. The store's baby registry is yet another helpful service, making gift giving easy, Stephenson says.

Owner Cathy Scott says helping her customers plan "the most exciting next step in their lives" is what makes her job rewarding. "It can be a rollercoaster of emotions for parents and you are there on this exciting ride. We then get to be there when their precious baby is born and watch these little ones grow from infancy onward. It will always bring a smile and warm our hearts."

Retailers carry middle and high-end bedding

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Bath n' Bedtime (416-781-8600), located in the Lawrence Plaza at Bathurst and Lawrence, offers one-stop shopping for all one's linen needs, says San Rajsky, owner of this popular linen store since 2006.

The store sells an array of bedding, bathroom accessories and tables linens at a variety of price points, she says. "We carry all kinds of quality from middle to higher end with fabulous prices.

"Our prices are usually 20 per cent less than department and big-box stores."

Rajsky invites people to see the large display of fashion bedding. "We have beautifully coloured sheets, pillowcases, comforters, duvet covers, throw pillows and throw blankets. We also carry mattress covers."

Throw blankets are meant to be decorative, she explains. "They go at the end of the bed to co-ordinate with the bedding."

Rajsky says people come to the store to get decorating ideas. "We have at least 20 beds that are made up with our latest collections and they look gorgeous.

She says the bedding brands that Bath n' Bedtime carries include Revelle, Nygard and Westex. "We look for quality products rather than brand names, because a brand name does not necessarily mean better quality."

So many sheets now focus on thread count, but the number can be "misleading," she says. The higher thread count may not be an indicator of higher quality.

"The only way to tell quality is to open up a package of sheets, stick your hand inside and feel the quality for yourself. Some people like softness, while others like a crisp sheet."

People have different needs in bedding, Rajsky says. Some people look for a blend of polyester and cotton, which requires minimal care. Others look in terms of colour and pattern.

She says people often come in with wallpaper and paint chips, which Bath n' Bedtime staff match up with linens. "We have people come in and ask for specific staff members. Many of them have worked here for years.

"People have worked with them before, and they were happy with the service and their knowledge… I like to say that they're the experts."

Rajsky says she maintains close contact with Canadian distribution centres so that the store can do special orders and replenish sizes or colours that may be out of stock at the store when possible. The store also does custom work, she adds. "Anything we normally carry we can have made in custom styles and sizes."

Rajsky says the store offers high-quality towels. "We sell loads of towels in Egyptian and Turkish cotton in a rainbow of colours. We have more than 50-feet of wall space from floor to ceiling of towels in all sizes and colours.

"We have fancy embellished towels, which are usually the decorative towels you find in bathrooms and powder rooms."

The store also offers monogram services, which, she says make lovely gifts for housewarmings or for newlyweds.

Bath n' Bedtime also sells bathroom accessories, from shower curtains and soap dispensers to tissue box covers and wastepaper basket sets. Many of these accessories are co-ordinated with matching shower curtains.

The store is also the place to buy tablecloths, Rajsky says. "At Passover, the bigger the better. We carry tablecloths that are 200 inches long. That's huge."

For the summer, bright vinyl tablecloths are "great for outdoors," she says.

Rajsky recommends tablecloths with polyester for easy care. "The more polyester, the less ironing is required. We have some tablecloths that don't require any ironing at all. That's what easy care means.

"Easy care is usually stain resistant. If the tablecloth is high in polyester, the stains come right out."

Rajsky says the store is seeing a new generation of customers who come in with their parents. "Some of the people who bought their linen from us when they were newly married are bringing in their adult children to shop at the store now."

David Saini, of David's Fine Linens (416-590-7311) in Bayview Village, invites his customers to visit the newest location of David's Fine Linens (905-264-7778), a clearance centre that recently opened in Woodbridge (8099 Weston Rd. near Highway 7).

David's Fine Linens is known for its high-end domestic and imported linen. A lot of the bedding comes from Italy and France, says Saini. "This exclusive linen is either cotton, silk or MicroModal. All are the most luxurious fabrics.

"MicroModal is softer than silk and breathes 50 per cent more than cotton and linen."

Saini explains that what makes this Italian-made fabric so soft is its wood cellulose fibres, which come from beech trees.

But MicroModal is expensive, he adds. A sheet set – which includes a fitted bottom sheet, an upper sheet and pillow case— can set you back $1,000 and a duvet cover and sham cost an additional $1,000. "Our store is not about price, it's about quality."

MicroModal sheet and duvet sets tend to be monochromatic, in muted colours such as ivory, white, taupe and pesto, he says. "This sheet is machine washable and it doesn't wrinkle.

"It's one of the most high-end sheets. Once you sleep in that sheet and you experience it, you won't want anything else. The sheets are used by royalty and celebrities."

For people who want a more colourful palette, Saini recommends cotton bedding from France.

Bedding from Bath & Bedtime

He notes that a high thread count is not necessarily an indication of high quality because it's all about the quality of the yarn. "The better the yarn, the better the quality of the fabric.

"All our European linen is woven and sewn in Europe."

David's Fine Linens also sells luxurious Canadian-made down duvets, as well as an exclusive European duvet line made of pure eiderdown, from eider ducks in Iceland and Canada.

While the store sells high-end domestic brands of towels, Saini recommends a line of cotton towels made in Portugal. "They're very soft and luxurious. They last a long time and feel different than regular towels."

The towels come in 60 colours and can be monogrammed. "We can do custom orders," he says.

The store sells high-end table linens as well. Many of the tablecloths are imported from Italy and France, but there are many domestic brands as well. "We have table coverings in all sizes for up to 24-place settings."

Saini says table linen fabrics include damask, cotton and linen. A popular and practical item is a line of colourful French coated cotton tablecloths that are water resistant.

David's Fine Linens, now in operation for 33 years, provides customers with an interior design service, says Saini. "We offer very good help. Our professionally trained interior designers do home visits for people who are buying their linen from us."

The new clearance centre will have the same high-end quality as the Bayview store, but the selection may not be as extensive, he says. " We are looking forward to serving our customers at this new location."

First fruits for the cabinet

At the start of the cabinet meeting in Jerusalem this week, Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu held a basket of grapes given to him by a group of children on the eve of Shavout, the festival of first fruits. [Flash90 photo]

Federations urge Israel to withdraw conversion bill

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

North American Jewish federations, including those in Canada, are joining rabbis representing the majority of North American Jews in calling on the government of Israel to withdraw a proposed conversion bill that they term "dangerous" and inconsistent with democracy.

In a letter to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, spokespeople for the mainstream Jewish organizations say they have "profound misgivings about the proposed conversion law."

While they applaud the intent of the bill to ease the conversion of the thousands of Russian immigrants, the letter writers believe the bill will fail to do this. In addition, it "will dangerously alter the Law of Return by consolidating conversion power in the hands of the Chief Rabbinate in ways that would be disastrous for the unity of the Jewish People," the letter states.

"By legislatively granting the power of conversion to the Chief Rabbinate exclusively, this bill explicitly connects conversion to a single religious stream. It does not recognize conversion via the streams that represent 85 per cent of Diaspora Jewry. This message is inconsistent with the democratic ideals on which the State of Israel was founded. Furthermore, it will undoubtedly alienate many North American Jews from Israel, widening an already precarious and growing rift that should concern us all."

The letter was signed by representatives of the Jewish Federations of North America as well as officers of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, the Reconstructionist Rabbinical Association, the Rabbinical Assembly, the Jewish Reconstructionist Federation, the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism and the Union for Reform Judaism.

Ex-soldier Sentenced

GUELPH, Ont. — An 83-year-old native of Germany who was a German soldier in World War II has been sentenced to six months in jail for scrawling anti-Semitic graffiti in various locations around Guelph, Ont. Judge Norman Douglas sentenced Max Mahr May 10 on charges of wilful promotion of hatred against an identifiable group. He was arrested and charged last September for hateful remarks against Jews found in private and public locations around Guelph. Court heard about 19 instances of graffiti that urged the killing of Jews. Mahr pleaded guilty in March. He was also sentenced to two years' probation and 40 hours of community service. The judge rejected Crown and defence suggestions that, as a former Hitler Youth member, he was a product of his time and should serve his sentence in the community. Canadian Jewish Congress strongly supported the sentence.

Wilma Kwinter, 74

TORONTO — Wilma Kwinter, wife of longtime York Centre MPP and former Liberal cabinet minister Monte Kwinter, died May 11 of cancer at age 74. She was described by her family as the "driving force" behind the political career of her husband, an MPP since 1985.

World

Memorial Unveiled

ATHENS — A memorial to Greek victims of the Holocaust was unveiled May 10 by government and Jewish officials in Athens. The mayor along with the president of the Athens Jewish community and head of the Central Board of Jews in Greece, unveiled attended the event. Athens is the last European capital and Greek city to erect a memorial to its Shoah victims. About 65,000 Greek Jews died in Auschwitz from 1941 to 1944. About 5,000 Jews live in Greece today.

Artist 'Owns' Golem

PRAGUE — A Prague court has recognized an artist's right to the image he designed of the Golem. The court last week acknowledged the right of the daughter of the late sculptor Jaroslav Horejc, who created an image of a burly clay giant for the Czech film The Emperor's Baker/ The Baker's Emperor, to the image of the character. According to legend, the Prague Golem was created by Rabbi Judah Loew ben Bezalel, chief rabbi of Prague in the 16th century, to defend the Prague ghetto from pogroms. Horejc's image was the first time the Golem was shown as a giant, inhuman figure and not a human figure.

Burger King To Close

JERUSALEM — Burger King will shut its Israel stores this summer. The 55 fast food outlets will be renovated and reopened as Israeli Burger Ranch restaurants, Orgad Holdings, which owns franchise rights to Burger King in Israel and owns the Burger Ranch chain, said last week. Burger Ranch operates 52 outlets in Israel. Burger King joins Starbucks, Wendy's and Dunkin' Donuts as U.S. franchises that failed in Israel. Israelis seem to prefer an Israeli-style burger to Burger King's U.S.-style Whopper, Orgad said. Burger Ranch, originally from South Africa, opened in Israel in the '70s. McDonald's came in 1993.

Stanford Gets $12M For Jewish Studies

SAN FRANCISCO — The Jim Joseph Foundation will give Stanford University $12 million to renew its Jewish education studies department.

Sam Wineburg

The funding for the California university's School of Education will create a doctoral concentration in education and Jewish studies, and establish and endow a Jim Joseph professorship in education and Jewish studies.

The gift is the largest in the history of Stanford's School of Education. Stanford had offered a concentration in Jewish education from 1992 to 2002.

The school and the foundation say the grant will allow Stanford to join New York University as one of only two research universities in the United States offering a doctoral program in Jewish education.

Stanford will admit two students per year for the first three years of the program. One student will be added per year afterward to reach a total of seven.

The gift "[leverages] Stanford's depth and breadth in Jewish studies and our previous experience in the field of Jewish education," said education professor Sam Wineburg, who led Stanford's effort to renew the concentration.

Kofflers give $20 million to namesake arts centre

JTA

One of Canada's leading Jewish philanthropic families has made one of the largest gifts ever to Toronto's Jewish community with a donation of $20 million for a revitalized arts centre.

The gift from the Koffler family, which was pledged several years ago, will go toward a new design and expanded facilities at their namesake Koffler Centre of the Arts.

The donation will fund a state-of-the-art facility that will include exhibition galleries; dance, music, visual and digital arts studios; performance and presentation spaces; and a bookstore, cafe and museum-standard gallery, according to a news release from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Philanthropists Murray and Marvelle Koffler established the centre in 1977. It offers some 65 classes a year in music, dance and visual arts for children and adults, and hosts visiting artists.

"We're delighted to follow up with the funds… and to encourage others to join us to build a state-of-the-art facility," Murray Koffler told The CJN last Thursday.

In addition to almost doubling the amount of space in the former facility, to 40,000 square feet, the new Koffler Centre will be "an eye-opener architecturally," Koffler said.

"It will be an exquisite piece of architecture… I think we will take our place amongst the major facilities in Toronto – the ROM, the AGO – to really give Toronto a magnificent renewed cultural facility – not only for the Jewish community, but it will be very attractive to the whole Toronto community."

The centre is situated on the 27.5-acre Sherman Campus, which also includes a Jewish community centre, the Holocaust Education Center, a sports complex and most of Toronto's Jewish communal services. The campus, on the site of the former Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, is under redevelopment as part of the Tomorrow Campaign.

"We are deeply grateful for this generous gift for the Koffler Centre of the Arts – a place that will be home to the finest in Jewish and world culture here in Toronto, as part of UJA's Sherman Campus development," Alan Winer, chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said in a statement.

Existential repercussions

From the editor's desk...

In this space last week, I brought readers' attention to the extremely negative reaction by some students at Brandeis University to the invitation extended to Israel's Ambassador Michael Oren to address the university's graduating class.

In last week's edition, the paper also carried a story about the attempt to prevent Canadian author Margaret Atwood from accepting a prestigious Israeli literary prize. To her great credit and praise, Atwood, as well as South Asian author Amitov Ghosh, refused to surrender to the anti-Israel bullying.

The key common thread binding both stories together, of course, is the fact that they represent two different aspects of the international campaign to delegitimize the Jewish state.

The phrase, the delegitimization of Israel – despite its clunky, academic, complicated-sounding nature – is spoken now a great deal among supporters of the Jewish state. It needs to be. It is an armaments-laden warship intending maximum harm cruising steadily toward Israel from a clouded blood-red horizon.

Israel's enemies, in the main, have correctly concluded that they cannot defeat the Jewish state militarily. They have tried – often – and failed. That is not to say they have abandoned their efforts to harm the people of Israel. Terrorists and the states for which they are murderous, anarchic proxies still try to kill Israelis from time to time. But Israel's security forces, thank God, have been able to thwart most of those efforts recently.

This is also not to diminish the grave physical threats Israel faces from the missiles of Gaza, south Lebanon, Iran and increasingly of late, from Syria, too. The Israel Defence Forces stand in harm's way to try to prevent the missiles from flying, let alone landing.

Israel's singular ability to protect itself from military hostilities, however, has not been duplicated on non-military battlefields. It has not been successful in thwarting the worldwide campaign that defames it with an entire Roget's thesaurus of foul disparagements: an apartheid, occupying, colonialist, etc., state.

Many individuals have warned against this campaign for many years. Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, for example, was one of the first to point to the dangers of the cynical and calculated abuse of language by Israel's enemies.

The cumulative impact of some 40 years of generalized anti-Israel rhetoric made more infectious over the last decade by the additional "apartheid" calumny, the danger to Israel has become more imminent.

In the April 26 edition of The Jerusalem Report, Leslie Susser has written a highly informative yet chilling report on this very subject called The Tide of Delegitimization.

"The delegitimization strategy is not new," Susser notes. "But it is growing more insistent and the danger is that if allowed to go unchecked, it might achieve a critical mass that could seriously jeopardize Israel's existence as the state of the Jewish people."

Anti-Israel protests on campus

Susser explains why that is so.

"In comparing Israel to white supremacist apartheid South Africa, the delegitimizers have found the perfect tool for a potentially lethal two-pronged attack: if Israel is based on segregationist principles, it deserves to be spurned by the international community; and, if applied to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the South Africa solution – one man, one vote, in a single unitary state – would mean the end of the two-state model, Israel and Palestine, and the end of Israel as the national home of the Jewish people. In other words, getting the Israel-apartheid analogy to stick is a formula for Israel's dismantlement.

"Over the past decade, the delegitimizers have had a number of high-profile successes, the most notable of which were the [UN] 2001 Durban [World Conference against Racism], which targeted Israel, and last year's United Nation's Human Rights Council's Goldstone report, which made allegations of Israel war crimes in Gaza. Both energized an ongoing campaign that has been making inroads in academic, trade unions, churches, the media, the UN and international legal forums.

"Worse: in recent years the challenge to Israel has been exacerbated by the "new media" through a glut of malicious anti-Israel blogging on the web and the use of social networking to mobilize anti-Israel activities."

Susser is a thoughtful, veteran analyst. He is not prone to overstatement or alarmism. His observations should be carefully noted and studied.

Typically also, Susser does not leave the subject without also exploring possible responses to the delegitimizers. He refers extensively to an interview he conducted with Eran Shayshon, one of the authors of a report by the non-partisan, Tel Aviv-based think-tank, the Re'ut Institute.

In next week's column, I will share some of the possible responses to the campaign to delegitimize Israel.

City could pull Pride funds if QuAIA marches

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

On the heels of the Conservative government's decision not to give the Toronto Pride Parade federal dollars, a motion by two city councillors is seeking to pull municipal funding from the event if an anti-Israel group is allowed to participate again this year.

The City of Toronto contributed $121,000 to the parade in 2009, and city council had planned to give it the same amount this year.

But at the May 12 city council meeting, councillor Giorgio Mammoliti put forward a motion – seconded by David Shiner – to withhold city funding for the July 4 event if Queers Against Israel Apartheid (QuAIA) is allowed to march, as it did in 2009.

The motion urges the city "to advise the Pride organizers that the City of Toronto's 2010 funding and support be revoked" if they don't invoke the city's anti-discrimination policies and bar the group.

The agreement of at least two-thirds of councillors at last week's meeting was required for the motion to have been debated and brought to a vote, but it didn't receive the required support.

It was then referred to council's executive committee – the body chaired by the mayor that makes recommendations on funding and strategic priorities – for more debate before it comes back to council on July 6, two days after the parade happens.

If QuAIA applies and is refused entry to the parade, the issue of revoking city funds is moot. However, if the group is accepted, council will then vote on whether to revoke funding, which is being held up because of the motion, said Rita Davies, the city's executive director of cultural services, who administers the Pride grant.

Either way, the executive committee will know what Pride Toronto decides by June 4, the deadline for parade applications.

As of last week, QuAIA had not submitted an application to take part in the parade, said Tracey Sandilands, executive director of Pride Toronto.

Reached late last week by e-mail, Elle Flanders, a spokesperson for QuAIA, told The CJN that her group will be submitting an application to march. Flanders wrote that as a Jew who grew up in Israel, she was "personally not interested in being represented by homophobes like Mammoliti."

She added: "I am further embarrassed at the breakdown of democratic process when it comes to criticism of Israeli state policy. Mammoliti's motion is without basis: criticism of Israel does not equal hate. Crying anti-Semitism where it does not exist is harmful to the Jewish community."

Councillor Karen Stintz, who supports Mammoliti's motion, said that even if Pride refused QuAIA's application, it would still be possible for its members and supporters to march individually, as long as they didn't "carry banners."

"The group may choose to march without any banners, and we can't stop people from marching, as long as they don't carry [signage]," Stintz said.

She added that the city has notified Pride Toronto in writing that its funding is "in jeopardy" if they don't adhere to Toronto's anti-discrimination policy.

Asked if Pride had received any official letter from the city stating it would revoke funding from the parade if QuAIA was allowed to participate, Sandilands replied: "We have received no formal letter from the city about anything. However, during our meetings with city representatives, we have undertaken, and agreed in writing, that we will ensure compliance by all parade participants with the city's policies, which require that we present an environment that is positive and welcoming to all participants, and we intend to keep our word on this."

In April 2009, Pride Toronto signed the city's Declaration of Non-Discrimination, which requires it to declare that it "adopts and upholds" Toronto's policies prohibiting harassment and guarantees that the parade will be free of "hate activity based on age, ancestry, citizenship, religion, ethnic origin, disability, family status, gender identity, place of origin, race and political affiliation" among other criteria.

Martin Gladstone, the lawyer, filmmaker and gay rights activist who helped bring attention to the 2009 parade's alleged contravention of city anti-discrimination regulations – most notably through through his recently released film Reclaiming Our Pride – has asserted that QuAIA's presence in the parade introduces an element of "hate-messaging" through "political advocacy" based on the group's claims that Israel is an apartheid state.

He said the parade is about the celebration of gay rights, not "the demonization" of Israel.

"If a publicly funded venue lets in groups that promote hate and intolerance with false branding and lies, that is not free speech. That is a form of hate speech," Gladstone said. "It is especially hateful, as Israel is a gay haven, and these groups are silent and ignorant about the treatment of gays in the greater Arab and Muslim world. QuAIA can say what it wants, just not on our dime. Let them apply and get their own parade."

The Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center issued a statement last week supporting Mammoliti's motion, calling on the city to use the "window of opportunity to do the right thing and prevent hate groups like QuAIA from fomenting hatred and discord in the annual parade."

Shiner said council's consideration to revoke funding from Pride isn't a "Jewish community" issue.

"This motion means if [event organizers] don't abide by the same policies that everyone else has to abide by regarding using city facilities or receiving city funding, then the city will reconsider supporting the organization," he said. Meanwhile, the province says it has already put through its $300,000 to help fund the parade through its Celebrate Ontario program.

Mukunthan Paramalingham, spokesperson for Ontario's Ministry of Tourism and Culture, said while provincial money has already "flowed through" to Pride, the province is "aware of concerns that have been raised and [we] are currently monitoring the situation."

Is Russia reverting to its old form?

Ill winds wafted westward last week from Moscow. They carried with them the distinctly disquieting, odious essence of the anti-Israel (and anti-West) policies from the worst days of the KGB/NKVD/Cold War/Kremlin attitudes of the old Soviet Union.

A flurry of news items last week carried the currents of the bad air.

Russian President Dmitry Medvedev visited Syria. He was there to conduct a great deal of business, the first item of which was the feasibility of Russia building a nuclear power plant for the government in Damascus.

In the midst of the discussion concerning the reactor, Medvedev took time to visit with Khaled Meshal, the leader of Hamas. The fact that Meshal and his organization, Hamas, are theologically, militarily and politically committed to Israel's annihilation did not seem to bother the Russian leader.

At the end of the week, the Russian news agency Itar-Tass announced that the Kremlin will supply Damascus with warplanes, anti-tank weapons and air defence systems. As reported in Ha'aretz, Mikhail Dmitriyev, head of the Federal Service for Military-Technical Co-operation, said Russia will supply Syria with MiG-29 fighters and truck-mounted Pantsir short-range surface-to-air missiles and anti-aircraft artillery systems. He did not specify the kind of anti-tank weapons.

The prospect of a nuclear reactor in Syria poses major security challenges for the region.

The high-profile visit by the president of Russia to the head of Hamas was annoying as well as a rebuff of Israel.

But the announcement of the sale of weapons to Damascus is very troubling. Syria is an ally of Iran, a conduit of Iranian weapons to Hezbollah and a haven to terrorists and terrorist organizations, such as Hamas. Moreover, weapons sold previously to Syria by Russia were passed along to Hezbollah and used against Israel in the Second Lebanon War in 2006. Rather than moderating Syrian behaviour – trying to incline it toward accommodation and peaceful coexistence with Israel – Russia is doing the very opposite. It is assiduously ensuring that Syria remains aligned with the forces opposed to peace.

While Medvedev was fully engaged in Damascus, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov in Moscow warned the United States and other western nations not to unilaterally impose sanctions on Iran. Both the European Union and the United States are trying to devise a fall-back option to prevent the development of nuclear weapons in Tehran if the United Nations Security Council fails to agree on meaningful sanctions. Given these and other Russian pronouncements, not to mention the Chinese reluctance to impose sanctions on Iran, Security Council agreement is quite unlikely.

The events of the past week raise the unpleasant question: is Russia reverting to its old form? Let's hope not.

The government readied new austerity measures after consumer prices rose 19.4 per cent in April 1985, one of the largest monthly increases in Israeli history. The austerity measures included new taxes, a $23-billion (US) budget cut, and cuts to subsidies on basic food items, fuel and public transit. The increases, which far exceeded economists' expectations, came amid eight months of wage and price controls.

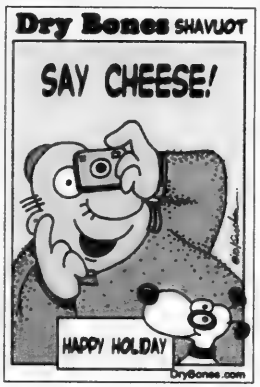
Anti-Semitic incidents in Montreal

I read the article "Montreal Jews fear 'gang atmosphere' amid rise in anti-Semitic incidents" in the May 5 edition of Ha'aretz and couldn't even recognize my own city (The Ha'aretz article is referred to in "Anti-Semitic crime stats refuted by Jewish leaders," CJN, May 13). The portrait that was painted of a community under siege is simply not an accurate reflection of how Jewish Montreal looks or feels.

Montreal, a fascinating, diverse and bilingual city, is a wonderful place in which to be Jewish. Both English and French communities recognize us as an important part of the rich fabric of our city and value the vibrancy we lend to the cultural blend. Our community recently held an Israel Day rally in the heart of downtown that attracted 13,000 participants. Later this month, thousands of people will join in our March to Jerusalem, our largest community walkathon. Israeli musicians will perform at this summer's Montreal International Jazz Festival. The city's Festival Sefarad is Canada's largest celebration of Sephardi culture. Montreal has the highest percentage of children attending Jewish day schools of any city in North America. We are not afraid to express our pride in being Jewish in very public ways, and we confidently send our children to Jewish institutions every day.



Is there anti-Semitism in Montreal? Unhappily, yes. Are anti-Semitic acts occasionally perpetrated? Unfortunately, yes. We must understand – though not accept, of course – that in any major urban centre there will be exceptions to the rule of civility, respect and tolerance. However, the statistics quoted in the Ha'aretz article are self-reported and anecdotal. Moreover, they don't distinguish between hate crimes and less extraordinary criminal activity, and are, therefore, of dubious accuracy.

Federation CJA is at the forefront of the fight against anti-Semitism. We engage in large-scale and widespread advocacy efforts to call attention to it and counteract it, in all its manifestations. Mindful of the international context, we understand the need to maintain vigilance. Several years ago, we created a department of community security, whose services we provide to the entire community. Many institutions have benefited from the federal Security Infrastructure pilot program, which enables us to provide better protection and to enhance our sense of well-being.

Al Jazeera Canada

The scope of Al Jazeera Canada's international news coverage redresses the mainstream media's relative neglect of events in the Muslim world ("Al Jazeera launches English-language service," May 13). However, some of the human interest programs that Al Jazeera has broadcast are troubling. One program was devoted to Palestinian accusations of Israeli land theft; another examined the attitudes of Israeli Druze to conscription. Both programs lacked objective historical contexts and opposing viewpoints. Their common anti-Zionist message was loud and clear.

Al Jazeera seems to take its CRTC license as permission to engage in insidious and hateful propaganda. The CRTC should not hesitate to revoke this network's licence should its early days prove indicative of what is to come.

New Israel Fund's grants

For me the problem with the New Israel Fund (NIF) is crystallized in the sentence about the views of Rabbi Eva Goldfinger of the Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism: "She says she supports about 80 per cent of its views, disagreeing mostly with its granting funds to what she called violent Palestinian groups" ("Criticism key to democracy, New Israel Fund president says," May 13).

That "20 per cent" is what I'd call the deal-breaker. What's the point of supporting an organization that expends 80 per cent of its efforts pushing for a vibrant, fair-minded democracy, if the other 20 per cent of the time it does its utmost to undermine that democracy by funding Israel's enemies?

In that sense, the percentages are largely irrelevant. After all, Hezbollah is involved in a number of socially valuable activities, too – building hospitals and schools and the like. In that sense, we might think of it as "the New Lebanon Fund." But that neither changes nor mitigates the fact that it intends to annihilate Israel – an agenda that has the full backing of the "violent Palestinian groups" that, foolishly and suicidally, the NIF supports.

Coalition leaves British Jews uncertain

By WINSTON PICKETT
JTA

With Britons uncertain of how the country's first coalition government since World War II will go about governing, the country's Jewish community appears to be taking a wait-and-see approach to the new Conservative-Liberal Democrat government.

Nick Clegg

During the campaign, many Jews expressed alarm at Liberal Democratic positions on Israel.

Now party leader Nick Clegg, who last year called for a European arms boycott of Israel, is Britain's deputy prime minister. And William Hague, the Conservative party leader who, during the 2006 Lebanon war, called Israel's military response to Hezbollah's attack "disproportionate," is the new foreign minister.

What influence that will have on British foreign policy is, like much about the new government, a political unknown.

The new prime minister, David Cameron of the Conservative party, has been a strong backer of Israel. It is one of the many issues on which the Conservatives and Liberal Democrats have fundamental philosophical differences. Others include how to trim the country's deficit and bring spending under control.

> 'With so much on the government's plate, Israel – along with foreign policy in general – will be put way on the back burner'

"With so much on the government's plate, Israel – along with foreign policy in general – will be put way on the back burner," said Robin Shepherd, foreign policy director of the Henry Jackson Society think tank and author of Beyond the Pale: Europe's Problem with Israel.

"Given that both parties in the coalition will be preoccupied with the economy and that the Conservative party has shown no real interest in the Middle East anyway, the British Foreign Office will find itself in an immensely powerful position to influence the direction of policy," Shepherd said. "In other words, the Arabist-oriented bureaucracy is likely to inherit a lot of power by default as top politicians attend to other matters."

Candidates affiliated with the Conservatives and Liberal Democrats said the Jews should not worry.

"I don't think the Jewish community has anything to fear," said Robert Halfon, a Jew and a prominent figure in Conservative Friends of Israel who won a parliamentary seat last week for the Conservatives representing Harlow, north of London.

Matthew Harris, a Liberal Democratic candidate in Hendon who finished third in a race won by the Conservative candidate, said, "I think British Jewry will be pleasantly surprised by this government, and particularly by the quality of the five Lib-Dem cabinet ministers that will be taking up their posts. Whether on faith schools, security or even Israel, I think people will find the Lib-Dems and this coalition to be broadly supportive of Jewish interests."

For the time being, official Jewish bodies made do with issuing pro forma statements congratulating the new government.

The country's Jewish umbrella group, the Board of Deputies of British Jews, published a statement saying it "warmly welcomes the new prime minister, David Cameron, and his coalition Conservative/Liberal Democrat government" and that it "looks forward to a constructive, fruitful working relationship with Mr. Cameron, his cabinet and his wider team, together with a continued, regular dialogue with politicians of all parties and key civil servants."

Jeremy Newmark, chief executive of the Jewish Leadership Council, had no comment.

"As a strategic body, it is not our role to provide a running commentary on a government that has yet to finalize its cabinet and set out key policies," he told JTA.

Leaders of various Jewish organizations are hoping the candidates' pledges to the Jewish community, made in interviews with the country's main Jewish newspaper, the Jewish Chronicle, will hold fast. Both Clegg and Cameron promised support for security for the community. Clegg pledged to put 3,000 more police officers on the streets, and Cameron backed the funding of security around Jewish institutions, including schools.

As for the faith schools themselves – a major concern for many British Jews – new Education Secretary Michael Gove has long been considered a staunch advocate of Jewish communal interests, particularly in countering anti-Semitism. Gove, a former Times columnist and the author of Celsius 7/7, critiquing what he deemed the lax policies of Britain and the West toward terrorism, has publicly voiced his support of state-supported Jewish schools and pledged that the schools "will not have to pay for security" under a Tory government.

David Cameron

Both Cameron and Clegg said they backed changes to the current "universal jurisdiction" legislation, which allows British magistrates to issue arrest warrants for visiting foreign politicians and military staff. The law has been used to target Israeli officials and soldiers for alleged war crimes, in some cases scaring away Israeli officials from visiting Britain.

Cameron and Clegg have also spoken out forcefully against anti-Semitism.

As news of Britain's new coalition government sank in, Jews also were trying to assess how the government's priorities for cutting spending would affect domestic Jewish interests.

"It's too early to know how a deficit reduction program will impact on funding for state-supported Jewish schools and social services," said David Seidel, a community organizer in Brighton and a member of the Board of Deputies of British Jews. "Ditto for the final outcome of the new government's policies generally, as well as whether the government can remain stable."

In post-election analyses, it appeared that the Jewish community, like the rest of Britain, swung Conservative in last week's vote.

In an analysis by the London Jewish Forum of 18 parliamentary constituencies, 40 per cent of Jews voted Conservative, 37 per cent voted Labour and 19 per cent voted Liberal Democrat. That differed only slightly from the London-wide general vote, which went 34 per cent Conservative, 37 per cent Labour and 22 per cent Liberal Democrat.

"This is a shift from a dominant Labour preference in years past and is something that is important to keep in mind on the local level where day-to-day Jewish interests are represented," said the director of the London Jewish Forum, Alex Goldberg. "When faced with budgetary cutbacks promised by the new coalition government, grassroots alliances are key."

Meanwhile, Jewish British ministers David and Ed Miliband are both set to run for the leadership of the Labour Party in the wake of prime minister Gordon Brown's resignation. The brothers are the sons of Jewish immigrants to Britain.

Brown stepped down last week as prime minister, and said he'll also step down as Labour leader by September.

The Milibands lost about 80 family members in the Holocaust. Their mother is Polish-born Marion Kozek. Their late father was Belgian-born Marxist intellectual Ralph Miliband.

British citizen identified as Dubai suspect

JTA

LONDON — A British citizen who travelled on his own passport has been identified as a suspect in the assassination of a Hamas commander in Dubai, a British newspaper reported.

The Independent reported Sunday that the 62-year-old British citizen entered Dubai under his own name and carrying his genuine British passport. His father is believed to be a Jewish Palestinian who moved to Britain after World War II. The man is believed to be hiding in western Europe, according to the report.

Dubai police have informed Interpol of the name and passport number of the suspect. The Independent decided not to publish the suspect's name.

The new suspect brings to 33 the number of people accused by Dubai police of being part of the assassination of Mahmoud al-Mabhouh in a hotel room in January. The Israeli Mossad intelligence agency has been blamed for the slaying, in which Mabhouh apparently was suffocated after being drugged.

In March, an investigation by Britain's Serious and Organized Crime Squad found that the Mossad provided members of an assassination team with forged British passports.

The assassins used forged passports from Britain, Ireland, Australia and Germany to enter and leave Dubai. One of the newly identified assassins used a French passport.

Israel has neither confirmed nor denied its involvement in Mabhouh's assassination.

Opinions

More on hair and equality

Equality is a difficult concept to define and apply. It pertains to principles, values, opportunity and agency. There are variables of culture, history and belief that underlie distinctions of significance and merit.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

When in my last column I wrote about women's head coverings, I wasn't oblivious to the distinction between issues of equality and identicality. The ongoing struggle for women's equality is not and has never been about women's desire to be like men. Rather, it stems from the human aspiration for full rights, duties and privileges.

Our society claims that we grant equal rights, but what does that mean?

For those women who chose to wear a head covering, I argued that our principles of freedom of religion and civil rights guarantee the right to choose. Whether the choice emanates from a desire to follow a religious precept, to stand and proclaim one's identity, or to mark one's place in a system of relationships doesn't matter. From society's perspective, the dispute should not be about imposed notions of equality, but about the right to self-identity and freedom of choice.

In fact, some women opt to uncover their heads, to show their freedom by challenging those notions of women's place and control. That decision is also one of choice and agency. It's often applauded as a sign of equality in western society. From our society's perspective, both choices should be equally tolerable. (For the purposes of this discussion, I'm not including issues of security, which raises other questions.)

Accordingly, when I argued that Jewish women should cover their heads in prayer, what was I demonstrating? It seems that some thought my point was that women should don the kippah as a sign of male equivalence or worth. For me, the issue is surely not one of gender identicality. Women don't want or need to be like men. Women should cover their hair at prayer only if the requirement is for a Jew to enter a sacred space or to pray with a covered head.

If the issue is rendered as Jewish, not gendered, then women should follow that tradition to pronounce their Jewishness.

The problem of course lies in the face of our androcentric texts. For ages, our definition of a Jew was male. All our norms were geared toward a man's performance. We need to redefine our conceptual standard.

Women are part of the covenant between God and the people of Israel. I believe women should practice the requisite rules as Jews, created equal in the image of God.

Does this wall unite or divide us?

"If you can do life review with a forgiving heart, your last 30 years will be quite transformed." So said Jane Fonda in a recent New York Times interview.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

I am starting on those last three decades (I hope). We'll see how far I get.

According to this fitness guru, I should do a life review now, lest I miss that transformation.

Shakespeare saw old(er) age as a state in which we totter on, "sans eyes, sans teeth, sans everything." Of course in his era, most people over 50 would be dead, totally infirm or considered sorcerers to live that long in an age of plague and war.

I have been fortunate to have a loving family, live in a democracy and be able to serve my community.

But I must include in this review a place, that, over the years, has had its meaning eroded in my heart.

Let's begin in Britain, where an ad for tourism in Israel depicting the Western Wall as part of its photos of Israel has been banned. People are appalled. Is not the Western Wall, the retaining wall of Herod's Second Temple mount, the supreme symbol of our people's return to their land and Jerusalem?

Well, yes and – more and more in recent years – maybe no.

I recall the first time I saw that remnant. It was a narrow strip of stone in a dark alley of the Old City. It was 1964. Jordanian soldiers patrolled the streets, and, of course, no Jews were praying at the Kotel, as they were barred from entry into their former homes and holy places. How I got there is a story for another time.

So it was with wonder that I came early one May morning in 1971 to see the Wall, newly restored and accessible to all who wanted to worship or just to gaze on this long-hidden symbol. In fact, I woke the entire family at 5 a.m. on our first day in Jerusalem to march them down to the Kotel so they could share the moment with me.

Over the years, each visit to that site has driven those moments of awe and wonder further away from me. Now women guards – for that is what they are – in ultra-religious garb demand that we dress, act and worship not from the heart but from the clothing. In fact they, like their men-folk, can attack without warning should we dare to wrap ourselves in tallit – never mind opening our mouths to sing.

And the State of Israel connives in this horrid takeover of a site that should belong to all. In fact, it can arrest us and charge any woman who dares to defy the ban.

Female soldiers aren't welcome at the wall for their induction ceremonies. It has been said that they're forbidden to sing the national anthem, merely to mouth the words, so that their voices will not offend.

Should we dare to take issue with Britain? We might want to pause in our indignant outrage and consider that maybe the wall isn't really a symbol of the state. Maybe, until it is returned to the entire Jewish people, it should not be so regarded.

Any life review I undertake includes my dedication to, and love for, the country of Israel. I once hoped to live there, and although that wish didn't come to pass, I have striven over the years to be there in good times and bad. (In fact, my children sometimes wonder if we choose to go there only when times are bad.)

But I don't live there, nor do I suggest a solution to the political matzav. One thing I do believe: we are in danger of losing our way. The government's appalling disregard of fundamental women's rights, placating a small minority for political gain – for that is what its policies with regard to the Wall are – sets a dangerous precedent. What other rights will follow those of women into the dustbin?

If I am to cultivate a forgiving heart, I may have to start somewhere else.

Some contemporary immigration issues

Historically, Canada has experienced a love-hate relationship with immigrants. We have extended a welcoming hand to those from certain countries. But for some others, we have been considerably less hospitable.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

For example, in the late 1800s and early 1900s, Chinese immigrants were subject to the notorious head tax and many prospective Chinese immigrants were simply denied entry. In 2006, the government of Canada formally apologized for this travesty.

Our own community is particularly sensitive to the abysmal behaviour of Canadian immigration officials in 1939 who refused entry to passengers aboard the ocean liner, the St. Louis. These desperate Jews were struggling to escape Nazi persecution and could find refuge in no country in the western world. Recently, the Canadian Jewish Congress received a grant from Citizenship and Immigration Canada to establish a St. Louis exhibit under the Community Historical Recognition Program.

After World War II, the doors of Canada swung open, permitting a wave of immigration that continues today. Demographic projections published by Statistics Canada indicate that by 2017, up to 23 per cent of the Canadian population will be members of a visible minority, and, by the year 2031, there might be twice as many individuals who are visible minorities as there are today.

Clearly, we are still a welcoming nation. And fortunately, Canada is not experiencing the strong backlash to immigration evident in parts of Europe and the United States. The government of France is proposing to ban Muslim women from wearing a full-face veil in public (either a niqab or a burqa). In Arizona, a new immigration law directed at stemming illegal immigration apparently permits racial profiling as a means to effect its enforcement.

Canada is, however, experiencing some changes in its immigration law and policy, particularly in connection with reform to our refugee system. Canada is known as a refugee-friendly country with a comparatively expansive policy related to those seeking asylum. We have traditionally identified refugee-producing nations and have had a somewhat negative attitude in respect of those applying from other countries. Now, we will be more receptive to asylum seekers from non-refugee-producing countries, the so-called safe countries of origin. Another change in our refugee policy relates to the timely removal of failed asylum claimants who, until now, were able to remain in Canada for years before their deportation was finally effected.

For immigrants who have successfully attained the status of permanent residents, there are private and public agencies in Canada that can assist with settlement issues. For example, for the past 85 years, Jewish immigrants have benefited from the work of the Jewish Immigration Aid Services (JIAS). In Edmonton, the Mennonite Centre for Newcomers has provided settlement assistance to immigrants from diverse backgrounds. Citizenship and Immigration Canada has established an Immigration Settlement and Adaptation Program and plans to enhance its settlement program with respect to refugees.

One concern in this settlement process relates to the accreditation of persons with foreign credentials. Many foreign-trained professionals are denied accreditation in their chosen fields and instead must earn their livelihoods in unrelated areas of employment. The matter is made more difficult, given that the accreditation of foreign training is a matter of provincial jurisdiction and there is only a limited role that the federal government can take with respect to this aspect of settlement. However, the government of Canada has recently announced that it is taking measures through Canada's Economic Action Plan to work with the provinces and territories in developing a common approach to recognition of foreign credentials.

For many, the culmination of the immigration process occurs on the day they acquire Canadian citizenship. However, there are some prospective changes with respect to citizenship. For example, in the past, some immigrants have been able to get by without ever learning to speak either English or French. However, the federal government is now proposing that future citizens must demonstrate a degree of proficiency in one of our two official languages.

New Canadians citizens learn the importance of the values entrenched in our Canadian constitution. These values include government adherence to principles of fundamental justice. It is hoped that all aspects of the immigration process continue to reflect this constitutional imperative.

Dutch Jewish child was saved by Christians

Max Arian, 70, a father of three grown children and a grandfather seven times over, lives in a graceful but worn mid-18th century building in the centre of Amsterdam. It is about two kilometres from Anne Frank House, the museum that immortalizes a Jewish teenager whose poignant diary has been read by millions in at least 60 languages.

Sheldon Kirshner in Amsterdam

While Anne Frank died of typhus at the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp after she and her family were rousted from their hiding place and arrested by the Nazis, Arian survived the five-year German occupation of the Netherlands thanks to the courage and kindness of Dutch Christian families.

He was one of 5,000 Jewish children, mainly under the age of five, who were brought to safe havens by Dutch individuals and the Dutch resistance movement. A statue in Amsterdam's Buitenveldert district, where many Jews live today, pays tribute to these Dutch rescuers. While 3,500 hidden children like Arian survived, 1,500 were betrayed and murdered, according to Diane Wolf, the author of Beyond Anne Frank: Hidden Children and Postwar Families in Holland.

Dutch Jewish children who fell victim to the Nazis were among the 107,000 Dutch Jews and the more than one million European Jewish children who were murdered during the Holocaust. For the Jewish community, the Holocaust was an unsurpassed catastrophe. 78 per cent of Dutch Jews having lost their lives, the highest fatality rate in western Europe. On the bright side, Dutch Christians rescued a total of 25,000 Dutch Jews during the Nazi era, some of whom did not survive.

After the war, Yad Vashem – the Holocaust museum and research centre in Jerusalem – honoured 4,717 Dutch Righteous Gentiles. One of them, Jaap Penraat, who died in 2006 at 88, was instrumental in saving 406 Jews by providing false documents.

Arian, a toddler when he was saved from the clutches of the Nazis, did not require forged papers to survive. He was hidden by a succession of families in the largely Catholic south, the first area of the Netherlands to be liberated by Allied armies.

He was an only child, born in Amsterdam to Arnold and Rebecca (Bep) Arian in March 1940, two months before the German army invaded the Netherlands. Arian was 2-1/2 years old when dire circumstances forced his parents to hide him. The Nazis had already passed a series of draconian anti-Jewish edicts, and the first deportations had begun.

Arian's memories of those days are sketchy and fragmented, but he has been able to reconstruct the chain of events that saved him from certain death.

His uncle, Nico, a bicycle mechanic in a bike-crazy nation, took him to a kindergarten opposite the Hollandsche Schouwburg, a theatre where Jews were held until they were deported to Auschwitz or Sobibor via the Westerbork camp.

A man from the Dutch resistance movement – which was slow to develop in the Netherlands – brought Arian to a family willing to look after him. Within weeks, this family panicked and returned him to the sender, fearing they would be exposed and subjected to severe penalties by the Nazis.

The second family that cared for him and another Jewish child, the Hellebrands, was headed, he thinks, by a miner. "They were lovely people, wonderful people," said Arian, a retired journalist who wrote a story about them in the 1980s.

Max Arian

All in all, he stayed with the Hellebrands for up to six weeks. After the Hellebrands, Arian was in the care of a succession of families whose surnames he has forgotten.

In December 1943, he was sent to the Micheels , a working-class family in the town of Heerlen. "Somebody, I don't know who, brought me to their house on a bicycle in the rain," he said. "After I arrived, I was served tomato soup."

Arian remained with them until the end of the German occupation. The Micheels – a poor, simple, open, nice, church-going family who had two children older than Arian – became his foster parents. Not once was Arian ever permitted to venture outside. "It would have been too dangerous," he said. Nor, of course, could he attend kindergarten.

Arian and his wife, Maartge, a retired French teacher, maintained regular contact with Alexander and Lies Micheels and their children after the war. Alexander and Lies died in 1980 and 1984, respectively.

"They were almost like family," he said of his late foster parents, whom he addressed as "aunt" and "uncle." "I'd go there on Easter, Christmas and the summer holiday."

Arian also kept in touch with his foster brother, Eddy, who died a decade ago. He still sees his foster sister, Josephine.

Arian's father, a commercial painter whose ancestors settled in the Netherlands from Krakow, Poland, in the 19th century, was caught by the Nazis and dispatched to Auschwitz on the first transport from Westerbork in the summer of 1942. He was killed in August of that fateful year.

Arian's mother, whose family arrived in the Netherlands centuries ago, survived the Nazi era in hiding.

His maternal grandmother, Mietje, managed to survive the rigours of Thereresienstadt. But her husband and Arian's grandfather, Philip, was murdered in Auschwitz.

With the liberation of the Netherlands, Arian was reunited with his mother. He remembers that day clearly. "A strange woman stepped out of a car. She was my mother, but I didn't recognize her."

Initially, Arian did not want to leave his foster home. "I loved my foster parents. They had been very nice to me. And they didn't want to be separated from me, either. But they knew it would have been impossible to keep me away from my mother. They understood her pain."

After leaving his foster family, Arian lived with his mother and grandmother, to whom he was particularly attached.

"She was very important to me," he said. "She was a lovely woman, good and brave."

His mother, who never remarried and suffered from depression, earned a livelihood as a fruit and vegetable wholesaler. She passed away in 2004, after Arian's grandmother died.

For a long time after the war, he was unable to resign himself to his father's death, hoping against hope that he would somehow return from the dead.

"These were thoughts and dreams," he explained.

After visiting Auschwitz in 1986 in the company of 90 other Dutch Jews, he finally ascertained that his father had died there. This confirmation enabled him to come to terms with his death.

Not surprisingly, Arian – who worked as a reporter and editor for De Groene, an arts and political weekly, for 25 years until his resignation in 2002 – cannot grasp why the Holocaust had such a profound impact on the Netherlands.

"Jews had been safe here. There was tolerance. This is such a nice country. There was anti-Semitism, but there was never a Dreyfus Affair, or pogroms. People were free. The idea that Dutch Jews would be killed on such a massive scale was simply inconceivable. Nobody thought anything terrible could happen."

On further reflection, he mused, "The Dutch didn't do enough to help. It took them too long to realize what was happening to the Jews. The Dutch people retreated into their own lives. They looked away. It was normal. When they protested the persecution of Jews in February 1941, it didn't help."

Arian is far from convinced that the Dutch were primarily indifferent to the plight of Jews. He has only to look into the mirror at himself for irrefutable validation.

Three reasons why we are happy with Romspen.

Our family has been more than happy to be investors in Romspen's commercial mortgages for the past 10 years. The Romspen Fund plays an important role in our family investment portfolio as well as being a significant part of our RRSPs.

Why are we happy? Three reasons. The interest yield has been very good; Romspen's monthly payments have never failed; and our interactions with Romspen principals and staff have always been excellent.

Jewish Life

Why the golden rule is golden

By RABBI ISSER PLINER

The story goes that a young Jewish man was approached by two non-Jews who tried to convert him to their religion. "What do Jews have? Only the Ten Commandments? Thou shalt not kill. Thou shalt not commit adultery. Thou shalt not steal. It sounds like it is speaking to a lowly people. Join us for we have the lofty ideal of 'love your neighbour.'"

Rabbinic Reflections

The young man, who was totally ignorant of his heritage, knew not what to say. He accepted the notion that "love your neighbour" had no connection to Judaism. Later, he attended a yeshiva for beginners, and he learned that "love your neighbour as yourself" is the Golden Rule for Jews.

Actually, our sages of the Talmud refer to this verse in the Torah as the "Great Rule." Rabbi Akiva coined the term, because he understood that "love your neighbour as yourself" is the foundation of most of the Torah's precepts. Hillel the elder expressed the same idea when he gave advice to a gentile who wanted to be taught the Torah while standing on one foot: "What you would not like someone to do to you, do not do unto others. This is the entire Torah; the rest is commentary. Go and study."

The young man's story makes us aware that Judaism shares the golden rule with other religions. "Love your neighbour as yourself" serves as a central principle for millions of people in the world. In fact, we have come to understand it as a universal truism that would be adhered to even if it wasn't a verse in the Torah.

However, it would appear from the sayings of Rabbi Akiva and the story of Hillel the Elder and other statements recorded in the Talmud and midrash by our sages that to accept the Jewish concept of "love your neighbour" as at best a universal truism is to understate its true meaning and scope.

Rabbi Shimon Schwab addressed this issue. He asked: why does this verse of the Torah conclude with the words "I am God," as if to say this idea derives from God himself? What would that mean for the other verses that don't conclude with God's signature? "I am God" doesn't give the verse "love your neighbour" any greater status, since the entire Torah is the handiwork of the Almighty.

Rabbi Schwab explains that "I am God" concludes this verse specifically to dispel the notion that, through the prism of the Torah, "love your neighbour" is a universal truism. Rather, it's a value rooted in eternity and not affected by human nature and changing conditions. Our reason for striving to love our neighbours as ourselves is that the Almighty commanded us to do so and for no other reason.

The sages of the Talmud conveyed a similar message. The tractate of the Talmud that is dedicated to morals and ethics – Pirkei Avot – opens with the following statement: "Moses received the Torah from Sinai." Why does this tractate begin by telling us where Moses received the Torah from, while the rest do not? Was this the only tractate handed down to Moses on Sinai while the others derived from somewhere else?

Surely not. Our sages are telling us that not only was the entire compendium of Jewish law given on Sinai, but even the precepts of proper behaviour were handed down there. We may logically understand what proper behaviour is and the need to comport ourselves accordingly. Yet, the only reason to behave ethically and morally is because God commanded us to. For this reason alone, the golden rule to "love your neighbour as yourself" is truly golden.

Goldman Sachs: a Greek tragedy

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Just as we thought the recession was over and economies around the world had turned the corner, we are witness to charges of fraud against Goldman Sachs and the potential default on the massive debt owed by Greece. As I have often written, many of the economic issues have less to do with economics and much more to do with ethics.

The problems besetting Greece appear to be rooted in an ethic of entitlement – people demanding the right to continued high levels of services regardless of the ability of the country to afford them. As has been noted, 15 years ago, Canada and Greece had similar debt levels. Canada wisely chose the path of cutbacks, restraint and balanced budgets. Greece did not. There was some short-term pain in Canada, but today we're the economic envy of the world (which highlights how bad it is for many others), while Greece is in danger of going bankrupt.

Goldman Sachs is the most successful investment bank in the world. Whether part of the success is a result of illegal activity in their soliciting of investors is something we may never know. While any legal outcome will be greatly significant for Goldman Sachs, it's the firm's moral conduct that should concern us. So long as making money in every which way – barring outright illegality – is the only goal that really matters, we will continue to see innocents suffer and quality-of-life issues receive scant attention. While many businesses have recognized the importance of promoting a proper work-life balance, much of the professional investing world has not.

What's most interesting is that Pete Rose is barred from the Baseball Hall of Fame – despite unquestionably having had a baseball career that warrants such induction – because he bet either on games involving other teams or bet on his own team to win. He has become persona non grata, as the 1919 "Black Sox Scandal" is still fresh in the memory of baseball authorities. Yet many in the investment world have come to the defence of Goldman Sacks, despite the fact its recommendations of which stocks to purchase came from people who were actually betting against the same stocks they were recommending.

From the perspective of Jewish law, there's nothing inherently wrong with betting against one's clients – provided such "bets" are revealed to the investing public. Let the investor decide if they'd like to invest with advisers who don't have confidence in their own recommendations. (With the track record of many advisers, the answer may very well be yes.) We don't subscribe to the view that people should put their money where their mouth is, that the interests of professionals must be aligned with their clients.

In conducting business with others, one should be looking out for their own personal interests. It's in the realm of charity and acts of kindness that the interests of others should be paramount. The business world must be run with integrity, transparency, clarity and forthrightness, but Milton Friedman's motto that the business of business is business is not far off the mark.

One may be prohibited from using business profits for charitable purposes or for retaining staff who don't contribute to the ongoing success of the business. While one may do so as an act of charity if one is a sole proprietor, doing so for a public company or a nonprofit is a misapplication of benevolence. One can't be nice to someone at a third party's expense.

Goldman Sachs executives may be correct in asserting their innocence. They may have done nothing legally wrong. And that's the crux of the problem.

Jewish Life

There was only one Maimonides

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

If there were not incontrovertible evidence that there was only one man named Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon (Maimonides or Rambam: 1138-1204), it would be tempting to think that there were two, or even more. Some of his works display an unrivalled mastery of rabbinic literature, others an amazing mastery of a totally unrelated field: Greek and Muslim philosophy. Maimonides was also an accomplished physician and a prolific writer on medical issues. And he wasn't a scholarly recluse, but rather an involved leader of the Jewish community of Egypt. He also provided compassionate advice to other Jewish communities far from his home.

Martin Lockshin

New books on Maimonides are published all the time. Almost all of them have to take a stand on the vexing question of identifying who the "real Maimonides" was.

There are two mutually exclusive viewpoints on the issue. In the yeshiva world, the real Maimonides was the scholar of Halachah (Jewish law) who felt that God's Torah was the essential place for a Jew to look for truth. True, Maimonides also dedicated time to philosophy, but he did that, according to the understanding, only in order to save a few perplexed Jewish souls.

The antithetical viewpoint, supported by professors of philosophy, is that Maimonides saw truth as coming out of philosophical inquiry. The Torah may be an important document for regulating human behaviour, but, according to this understanding, the essential truths that human beings ought to be striving to find are attainable not through Torah or Talmud study, but through philosophy.

And of course there are a variety of compromise positions. (Some wags have argued that when Rambam scholars get together, they first have to set the ground rules: "Are we going to talk about Mymonides or Yourmonides?")

Two books that appeared in 2009 take positions on the Maimonides question. Both were written by scholars associated, now or in the past, with the Hebrew University of Jerusalem: Rabbi David Hartman's Torah and Philosophic Quest (Expanded Edition) and Sarah Stroumsa's Maimonides in His World: Portrait of a Mediterranean Thinker.

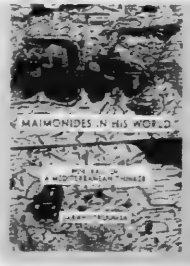
The first edition of Rabbi Hartman's book appeared in 1976, a few years after he left Canada and moved to Israel. In that book, he argued that the dichotomy between Maimonides the rabbi and Maimonides the philosopher was false. Through close readings of a number of texts from Maimonides, he argued that they were best understood by seeing Maimonides as committed to both Halachah and philosophy, and working toward integrating them.

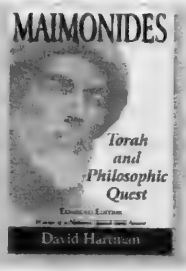
Now, 33 years later, Rabbi Hartman revisits the issue. His new book is actually just a reprint of the 1976 volume (with the same bibliography that stops in the early 1970s). He adds a 25-page postscript, in which he modifies his 1976 opinion that Maimonides pursued "the way of integration." Hartman's revised conclusion is that while Maimonides "believed in the value and importance of both Halachah and philosophic love of God," he "placed the latter above the former in the hierarchy of human activities."

For a scholar to modify his opinion publicly three decades after first recording it is perfectly reasonable and commendable. Many argue that Maimonides did the same, changing his opinion about many issues between his first major work, the Commentary on the Mishnah, composed around his 30th birthday, and his great work of philosophy, Guide of the Perplexed, composed two decades later.

In fact, some might argue that Rabbi Hartman and Maimonides both pursued the path of integration in their younger years while showing a marked preference for philosophy later in life.

Sarah Stroumsa's book about Maimonides is very different. (Tellingly, Stroumsa and Rabbi Hartman make no reference to each other's scholarship in their notes or bibliography.) With meticulous scholarly research, Stroumsa advances the clear thesis that a good understanding of Maimonides is impossible without solid knowledge of the intellectual life of the (non-Jewish) Mediterranean world that he came from.





Stroumsa's argument isn't based on one compelling piece of evidence, but on the combined force of a large number of proofs. In the framework of a short review, it's difficult to do justice to her argument, but I will summarize two fascinating examples of points of contact that she identifies between Maimonides' writings and the thought of the Islamic Mediterranean world in which he lived.

Maimonides once received a letter asking for his advice about a marital dispute. The husband claimed that his wife, having already raised a very large family, was refusing to sleep with him. The wife denied the allegation. The rabbi(s) who wrote to Maimonides didn't know how to proceed in such a case. Maimonides wrote back with the unusual suggestion that "reliable persons" should move in with the couple in order to determine what was really going on in their home. Stroumsa points out that this proposal has no precedent in Jewish law, but she shows that this type of marital therapy was commonly recommended in Muslim law books and practised in Muslim Spain, where Maimonides was born and grew up.

A second example is more controversial. Maimonides' life and the lives of all Jews of Muslim Spain were horribly interrupted by the 1148 invasion of Spain by the radical Muslim Almohades. Between the ages of 10 and 28, Maimonides lived under Almohade rule and may have had to pretend to be Muslim for part of that time. (The Almohades ignored the generally accepted Muslim legal principle that defined Jews as a protected minority [ahl al-dhimma]. Instead they forced Jews [and Christians] to convert to Islam.) Jewish historians often portray the Almohades as the benighted fanatics of medieval Islam.

Stroumsa reminds us, though, that the Almohades had among them a number of influential thinkers. In particular, they are known in Islamic studies circles for having a stricter interpretation than other Muslims of what the Islamic requirement of belief in one God entails. Maimonides, too, is known in Jewish studies circles for having the strictest definition of what the Jewish belief in one God entails, even writing in his great halachic work, the Mishneh Torah, that any Jew who takes the anthropomorphic language of the Bible (e.g. references to "God's hand" or "God's anger") literally is guilty of heresy. Almost all Muslims – even Maimonides' famous contemporary, the philosopher Averroes (or ibn Rushd) – and almost all Jews took a more forgiving attitude to the beliefs of the masses. Stroumsa offers the tantalizing suggestion that Maimonides learned his uncompromising attitude about monotheism specifically from the Almohades, the group whose uncompromising attitude had caused him and Jews in general much suffering.

The final word about Maimonides' thought has yet to be written, perhaps because no one who writes about him has mastered all the areas of knowledge that he mastered. But our understanding is richer from the attempts of scholars such as Rabbi Hartman and Stroumsa to shed new light on the great rabbi about whom it is said, "From [the biblical] Moshe to Moshe [Maimonides], there was none like Moshe."

Consul general calls for renewed outreach efforts

— Suggests new approach to improve Israel's image —

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

"What do you do when someone tries to isolate you? One simple thing: you make friends."

For Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general for Toronto and Western Canada, that's the key to his long-term ambition of changing Israel's image in Canada

But he believes making new friends for Israel will require a major shift by the local Jewish community to become more outward-looking and seek to build more ties with new immigrant groups.

In an interview late last month, Gissin – now midway through his four-year term – said the adversity faced by Israel and its supporters over the last few years – events such as Israeli Apartheid Week, boycott attempts against the Toronto International Film Festival for its focus on films from Tel Aviv and against the Royal Ontario Museum for its Dead Sea Scroll exhibit, and what he calls the ongoing "unholy coalition of Muslim radicals and anti-Zionist Jews" – is part of a larger, orchestrated attempt to isolate the Jewish state on the world stage.

That's why – despite the success of last year's Brand Israel pilot campaign in making Toronto a locus of positive exposure for the Jewish state, as well as a lightning rod for an anti-Israel backlash – he feels his work to repair Israel's image is just beginning.

The Canadian Jewish community can help, he said, by building lasting relationships with new immigrant groups who can benefit from lessons learned by Jews in overcoming obstacles and thriving in a new land.

Amir Gissin

Gissin said the Jewish community should give of itself "without immediate expectations of return," but with an eye to the long term.

"There are many things that can be done beyond pure philanthropic engagement," he said. "I want to suggest the following perspective: the [Canadian] Jewish community today is a strong one. That wasn't always the case. Still, it managed to build a functioning and flourishing [foundation] both culturally and financially.

"During this process, a huge experience was gained. And we now use these experiences every day in our [institutions]. But when we look at emerging, young communities, such as the African communities, we see groups who are inexperienced at building themselves up. They're troubled with more urgent issues, such as their own family struggles. This is where we can help."

Gissin said Jews should be deeply involved in mentoring and "engaging" with these communities.

"This is a vision currently not shared by most of the Jewish community," he lamented, saying that he hopes Jews, their lay leaders and their grassroots organizations will soon come to understand that "becoming relevant with other communities is the best safeguard to preserve the interests and goals of the Jewish community and in helping Israel" in the long term.

Gissin cited the Jewish-Somali Mentorship Project – which began last May and is supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canadian Somali Congress, the Canadian International Peace Project and Canadian Heritage – as a successful example of the "cross-culturalism" the community should be practising.

The Canadian Somali community is Canada's largest African diaspora community and one of the country's largest Muslim communities.

"The success of this project has caused the Somali community to look for ways to give back to us," he said.

Gissin said the current allies of the Jewish community and Israel are those who have had "good experiences" stemming from grassroots efforts of the past.

He said there's a "growing understanding" in Israel that the country needs to stop focusing on its "traditional" bilateral relationships and start focusing on other nations.

"Israel is beginning to engage more with more eastern European countries instead of western European ones," he said, adding that Israel isn't abandoning its traditional allies.

'Canada perceived as a true friend'

"Israel is developing a new focal point on relations with Europe," Gissin said. "[Relations with] countries like Poland, Hungary and Slovenia are now as deep, if not deeper, than western Europe."

Gissin said Canada is making a name for itself in Israel through its positive voting record at the United Nations and its various expressions of support for Israel, which have attracted attention in the Israeli media and the public arena.

"Compared to only a few years ago, Canada is now perceived by Israelis as a true friend, which is different than how they view most European Union countries," he said. "There's no doubt the Canadian Jewish community plays a central role in this shift."

Gissin had one last warning for Canadian Jews.

"Without intensive efforts to make more friends, we might wake up one morning to discover that the guys running the show [in Canada and the West] have different ideologies and commitments than the Jewish community does."

Haifa underground parking lot to double as hospital

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

One day, you go to a hospital and leave your car in the underground parking lot. Then two days later, you return to the parking lot, but instead, your injury will be treated right there, said Suzanne Kaye, national executive director for Canadian Friends of Rambam (CFR).

This describes the current project for expanding the Rambam Health Care Campus in Haifa, Israel.

Located close to the northern border of the country, the existing campus has faced rocket attacks in the past, such as during the Second Lebanon War, when the hospital protected its patients by bringing them to the basement.

In anticipation of another similar circumstance, the hospital came up with a plan to build a three-storey underground parking lot that could also be used as an emergency hospital.

Building an underground hospital for use only in wartime is impractically expensive, Kaye told The CJN.

Instead, in wartime, the hospital would replace the cars in the lot with 1,750 beds for their patients, where they can be treated while they are kept safe from chemical, missile and biological warfare, she said, stressing that hospital staff would be able to convert the parking lot quickly.

Actors show how an underground parking garage in Toronto could be turned into an emergency hospital. [Canadian Friends of Rambam photo]

The underground hospital could even be used to protect people during natural disasters such as earthquakes, Kaye added.

CFR arranged for actors to demonstrate the project to about 170 people from the professional and business community on May 4, bringing in hospital beds, equipment, and patients to the underground parking garage at Greenwin Square, 365 Bloor St. E., in Toronto.

The concept has "been kind of hard to understand for us here [in Canada]," said Kaye, explaining the reasoning for the demonstration.

It seems natural to park your car in a car park, and you assume it's always going to be there as a car park, she said. But "no, tomorrow it's going to be a hospital."

Guest speaker at the event at Greenwin Square was Michael Halberthal, head of the pediatric cardiac critical care unit and chief of triage at Rambam for mass casualty.

Part of Halberthal's job entails examining the patients entering the hospital during emergencies to determine who's to receive immediate treatment and who must wait. Although it's a difficult job, this ensures that people with serious injuries would receive care first, he told The CJN.

He described the planned underground hospital as completely safe and designed with special floors and ventilation systems to ensure that car fumes won't linger after conversion, affecting the treatment of the patients.

The builders have dug the hole and will begin adding cement soon, he said, adding that the project is slated for completion in about two years.

In total, developing the underground hospital will cost about $90 million (US), and Halberthal said the hospital is hoping to collect as much as possible through donations.

At the event at Greenwin Square, CFR advertised what they called a "garage sale," offering all 1,750 bed bays for purchase for $10,000 each, which would then be named for the donor.

There have already been a few purchasers, Kaye said, describing it as a great beginning.

As construction of the hospital/parking lot continues in Haifa, CFR plans to hold more events to share its progress.

As someone with an emotional and family connection to Israel, Kaye called the hospital/parking lot an essential cause, even for people who don't live in Israel.

Those living in the country call it their home, she said. "But when you live outside of Israel, it becomes your soul."

The Childventures Story

Over a decade ago, Dr. Walter Heidary began looking for an Early Learning Program for his own child. Some centres had good points, but none addressed all his concerns. So Dr. Heidary decided to create one that did! The first Early Learning Academy opened in Ancaster with world-class facilities and the world's best education techniques. Within months, enrolment was complete and 100's were on the waiting list. Today, there are four Childventures Academies and over 1,200 families have chosen to give their children the 360° Learning advantage.

360° Learning is the advantage your child deserves:

- The perfect balance of three educational approaches
- Magical indoor setting of quaint village streets, storefronts & cobblestone pathways
- Healthy breakfast, lunch & all-day snacks that children enjoy
- High tech security with hand-scan access for added safety
- Live internet viewing of your child engaged in daily activities
- Programs include Baby Signs for infants and Jolly Phonics for pre-schoolers
- Special art, drama, computer & music rooms plus indoor gym/outdoor playground

Police hate report includes 'Nazi' as victim group

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jews were the most targeted group in Toronto for hate crimes in 2009, but a couple of unexpected victim groups reported by police have some in the Jewish community shaking their heads.

Listed in tables of "victim groups" were "Nazi," "non-Jewish shikse" and even "police." They joined more conventional targets of hatemongers such as Jews, blacks and homosexuals.

Bernie Farber

Acting Insp. Steve Irwin defended the inclusion of the unorthodox categories in the Toronto Police Service's 2009 Annual Hate/Bias Crime Statistical Report. The victims "were affected by hate motivation," said Irwin, who headed the hate crime unit of the police intelligence branch for six years.

"They were targeted as identifiable groups."

But Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, said it's absurd to include Nazis among protected victim groups. "It makes the law silly. It makes anti-hate laws' sentencing provisions ridiculous. That's why no court in this land or other police force we know of makes this distinction."

Farber's critique, expressed to Irwin after the report was available last week, appears to have had an impact on police thinking. Irwin told The CJN that following talks with Farber, "we've engaged in discussion on the report and how we are interpreting those incidents that Bernie has raised."

Those conversations are currently internal, but will also soon expand to include the attorney general's department, people in "the legal world" and "communities that we have relationships with," Irwin said.

Jews most targeted group in 2009

Inclusion in the report of an occurrence against a Nazi was based on police interpretation of Section 718 of the Criminal Code, which provides enhanced sentencing for crimes motivated by hate directed to a number of identified groups, but which includes a category of "similar factors," Irwin said.

The Nazi mentioned in the report was the victim of the crime of "mischief" because of his ideological beliefs, he said, adding similar attacks against mainstream political parties, such as the Liberals or Conservatives, would warrant the same inclusion.

Police were included in the report based on graffiti smeared on a school that stated, "kill them."

The "shikse" incident occurred within the Jewish community when the neighbour of a Jewish man who was dating a non-Jewish woman, disapproving of the relationship, escalated a verbal attack against the woman by smashing a window.

Len Rudner, Ontario regional director of Congress, said police are missing the point of Section 718 and the anti-hate provision, which protect groups based on characteristics that "can't be changed, are inescapable."

Meanwhile, the hate crime report stated 174 incidents were recorded by Toronto police in 2009, up 13.7 per cent from the year before, but only half the number registered in the peak year, 338 in 2001.

The 174 occurrences in 2009 "is still below the 17-year average of 201 occurrences by approximately 13.4 per cent," the report said.

"The victim group most targeted in 2009 was the Jewish community, with 52 occurrences. The [lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered] community was the next most targeted, with 26 occurrences, followed by the black community with 24 occurrences and the Tamil community with six occurrences," the report stated.

"The Jewish community makes up just over four per cent of the population of the City of Toronto but was victimized in 30 per cent of the total hate/bias crimes in 2009," the report found.

Irwin acknowledged that for a city the size of Toronto, the number of criminal hate occurrences were few, but each incident is taken very seriously by police. "They're like murders to us, the most serious crimes," he said. "Like murders, hate crimes impact on what people perceive the city to be" as well as people's comfort levels in walking the streets.

Asked why police statistics differ so greatly from the 479 incidents in the GTA recorded by B'nai Brith Canada in its annual Audit of Antisemitic Incidents, Irwin said "our threshold is higher" and that only acts that are criminal in nature make the police list.

Farber agreed that "Toronto is one of the safest places for Jews to live." Credit for that should go to Toronto police and law enforcement services in neighbouring jurisdictions, which have made addressing hate crimes a priority, he said.

Centre's history reflects changing face of city

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

A plaque commemorating the colourful history of the Cecil Community Centre was unveiled last week as part of Heritage Toronto's Jewish Heritage Plaque initiative.

This is the fourth plaque erected as part of the Jewish heritage project, following one at the Kiever Shul in Kensington Market; one at the original site of the Federation of the Jewish Philanthropies of Toronto, now the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto; and another honouring the Young Men's-Young Women's Hebrew Assocation, at the site of the current Miles Nadal JCC on Spadina Avenue.

The Cecil Street building is a monument to the changing demographics of the area around College Street and Spadina Avenue, said Rebecca Carson, communications director of Heritage Toronto, a charitable organization and city agency.

"We're honouring the history of their support not just for the Jewish community but of Canada itself," she said.

Eric Slavens, a Heritage Toronto board member, said the project started when he sought ways to raise awareness of Toronto's Jewish history, leading to the series of plaques.

"The contribution of the Jewish community hadn't been properly recognized in the city through plaques," he said, adding that the goal was to mark places that shaped the city. Up next is the original Mount Sinai Hospital building on Yorkville Avenue, said Gary Miedema, co-ordinator of the Heritage Toronto plaque initiative.

Although the Cecil Community Centre is now owned by the City of Toronto, it began as the Church of Christ in 1891, and as per Heritage Canada's policy, the plaque bears this name. It became the Ostrovtzer Synagogue in 1925.

In 1922, Israel Weinberg, who was in the fur business at the time, and David Sussman, who owned the Toronto Slipper Company, purchased the building for $22,000, naming it after Ostrovtze, their hometown in Poland, explained Barry Weinberg, grandson of founder and former synagogue president, Israel Weinberg.

They replaced the heavy bell tower with a dome, which is still a feature of the building today, Miedema said.

"Many of the leading cantors in America of the '40s, '50s, and '60s performed and launched their careers at this shul," Barry Weinberg said.

Helen Friedman, Israel Weinberg's daughter, said she remembered the cantors performing at the shul on Sundays, after they had stayed with her family at their home on Grace Street.

She said the building had a huge emotional significance for her, recalling, for example, that when she was a child, food was left in a neighbouring home so that she and the other children could eat on Yom Kippur.

She was also married in the synagogue, on Sept. 12, 1943.

In 1966, the building was turned into the Chinese Catholic Centre, reflecting the changing community.

In 1978, it became the Cecil Community Centre and a home for the Chinese Interpretive and Information Services, now known as the Chinese Information and Community Services.

"I saw the beautiful building and I saw the opportunity," said Ramon Tam, who was involved in the transformation of the building for the centre. "The city bought it and they didn't know what to do with it."

Activities now held there include classes for seniors and activities for kids. During elections, all-candidates meetings are offered where proceedings are translated for the Chinese audience.

Despite the changes, the building still retains remnants of its Jewish history. The chandelier has Stars of David, and at the entrance are marble plaques engraved with the names of the founders of the synagogue.

Barry Weinberg said his grandfather had stipulated in the original purchase agreement that even if the building was sold in the future, these Jewish symbols must remain to recall a time when it was a centre for the Jewish community.

"Only in a city like Toronto could we have one building representing so many cultures," Slavens said.

Toronto-born rabbi gives bomb shelters to Israelis

— Operation Lifeshield provides unique service —

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Oh, a storm is threat'ning
My very life today
If I don't get some shelter
Oh yeah, I'm gonna fade away

War, children, it's just a shot away
It's just a shot away
– from Gimme Shelter by the Rolling Stones.

A Toronto-born man is saving lives in Israel.

Rabbi Shmuel Bowman is executive director of Operation Lifeshield, a non-profit organization that raises funds to build and deliver above-ground air raid shelters to Israeli municipalities that have been targeted by Hezbollah and Hamas bombardments in the past.

Rabbi Shmuel Bowman

Two weeks ago, Operation Lifeshield placed its 68th shelter near a school in Ashkelon, which was bombarded during the war in the Gaza Strip in 2009.

"We know we save lives," said Rabbi Bowman, a Torontonian who made aliyah in 1993 and has headed Operation Lifeshield since its formation in 2007. "If you're in a shelter during an attack, you won't be killed."

Operation Lifeshield, the only non-governmental organization in Israel active in this endeavour, was founded by two Israeli American businessmen, Shep Alster and Josh Adler, following the 2006 war in Lebanon.

By chance, they found themselves in the Galilee when war broke out and, like thousands of Israelis, had no place to hide when Hezbollah rockets struck Israel day after day.

Stung by this harrowing experience, they established Operation Lifeshield, which works in co-operation with the Israeli government and the Israel Defence Forces' Home Front Command.

Operation Lifeshield supplies two types of shelters – 30-ton models that hold up to 15 adults and 70-ton models that protect as many as 50 people.

The lighter model cost $19,000 to build, while the heavier one cost $38,000.

Both models are made of steel-reinforced concrete and can withstand direct hits and prevent shrapnel and bomb fragment injuries.

The majority of the shelters, 50, have been placed in southern Israel, in Sderot and environs, said Rabbi Bowman, who was in Toronto last week on a North American speaking tour to publicize Operation Lifeshield.

Prior to 2009, Sderot and a host of nearby communities were continually bombed by Hamas and Islamic Jihad, both of which are based in Gaza.

The remaining shelters have been placed in northern Israeli towns such as Safed and Karmiel, both of which are within range of the Lebanese border.

The shelters are open to Jews and Arabs alike, said Rabbi Bowman. "This is a humanitarian project."

For the past year, Operation Lifeshield has focused its efforts on sending shelters to Ashkelon.

"The people of Ashkelon became painfully aware that they are very vulnerable," he explained. "We've covered Sderot. It's done. There is no need for us to be there anymore. Now the focus is on Ashkelon."

In 2010, Operation Lifeshield will place 16 more shelters in Ashkelon.

Next year, Operation Lifeshield plans to concentrate on Ashdod and the Haifa region.

But as Hamas and Hezbollah upgrade their rockets, Operation Lifeshield may well expand its activities to the coastal region around Tel Aviv, Rabbi Bowman said.

"The entire country needs coverage," he added.

In general, shelters are required in parks and other open areas, as well as in or near schools, youth clubs, senior centres and synagogues.

Rabbi Bowman expects further tension to erupt in southern and northern Israel as Hamas and Hezbollah acquire a larger arsenal of still more deadly weapons and Iran takes further steps to acquire nuclear arms.

"Israel is in a very difficult position," said Rabbi Bowman. "Israel faces conventional and nuclear threats."

Hence the urgent need for more bomb shelters.

It's naive to equate Israel, Iran on nuclear issue

While western attention remains substantially focused on Iran's nuclear program as the major threat to instability in the Middle East, several Arab states are trying to divert attention to Israel and its undeclared nuclear weapons. They're using the current United Nations conference on nuclear non-proliferation as their forum.

Some media, including CBC Radio's The Current, have latched onto this story. In a segment titled "Israel's Nukes" (May 11), substitute host Gillian Findlay interviewed three experts: Wael Al-Assad, the Arab League's director of disarmament; Gerald Steinberg, professor of political science at Bar-Ilan University, and Peter Galbraith, senior fellow at the Center for Arms Control and Nonproliferation in the United States.

When Findlay mentioned to the first guest, Al-Assad, that Israel has said it favours a nuclear-free Middle East provided there's first regional peace, he replied that this is only "an invitation to proliferation," that the Arab states all signed the Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT), even though the Mideast conflict has not be resolved, and that a nuclear-free Middle East (even in the absence of full peace) would actually "help Israel be part of the region."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Steinberg countered Al-Assad's claims, explaining that despite Arab League rhetoric, it's Iran's nuclear program, not Israel's, that has triggered alarm in the region about proliferation. Steinberg also explained that Israel's longstanding policy of ambiguity (neither confirming nor denying that it possesses nuclear weapons) is "the least bad option" for a tiny country whose very survival is threatened. Israel's undeclared nuclear deterrence has been designed to deal precisely with this "vulnerability" – something western countries like Canada don't have to contend with.

As to the Arabs having signed the NPT, Steinberg reminded Findlay that several of them (Syria, Libya, Iraq) have simply violated its terms(as non-Arab Iran is currently doing). On the other hand, Israel has violated none of its international obligations and, unlike Pakistan and India, which have also not signed the NPT, has not tested a device.

Steinberg challenged Findlay's assertion that a "double standard" has been applied by pressuring Iran and not Israel on the nuclear issue. Talk of a "double standard," he said, is just a diversion, especially for media consumption, from the real problem – the menace that Iran's nuclear program presents to the world.

Nonetheless, Findlay's final guest, Peter Galbraith, downplayed Iran's threat to the point of appearing to be an apologist for the regime. Even though Galbraith acknowledged that Israel's nuclear program began as a "meaningful deterrent," he believes that the significant Arab threat has now "largely disappeared." In response to Findlay's question about the regional effect Israel's "opening up" on the nuclear issue might have, Galbraith said it would have "some impact" on Iran's program. And he immediately added: "But in the end, I think you also need to find some accommodation with Iran in which Iran has what it's entitled to under the NPT [which allows civilian nuclear power]... But also that there's some recognition of Iran's role as a pre-eminent power in the region. I think what the Iranians are really after is respect."

To say that this view would strike nearly all Israelis, and a great many others, as naïve is to put it mildly.

In his May 11 Toronto Star column, "York's Mideast debate a debacle," Martin Regg Cohn cut to the heart of a report prepared for York University following the intense controversy over its conference last year, "Israel/Palestine: Mapping Models of Statehood and paths to Peace."

The conference (a mix of academics and pro-Palestinian activists), he said, had more to do with "contributing to the conflict" than with looking for solutions. While Israel and the PA are talking about a two-state solution, Canadian academics were promoting a one-state (bi-national) "solution" that would mean Israel's disappearance.

Regg Cohn lucidly contextualized the matter: "Convoking such a conference delegitimizes the State of Israel, however much you try to sugar-coat it. Why not a conference proposing to dissolve Croatia and Bosnia into a reunited Yugoslavia? Or reconstituting the Soviet Union?

"If York academics are keen to rewrite history and unravel the UN's 1947 vote to partition British Mandate Palestine, why not undo the partition of British India? After all, if you're opposed to a Zionist Israel, why not oppose the homeland for Muslims in the Islamic Republic of Pakistan?"

Canadian union decries joint Canada-Israel stamp

JTA

The Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW) has refused to put its stamp of approval on the first-ever postage stamp issued jointly by Canada and Israel.

Unveiled last month, the international rate stamp commemorates 60 years of bilateral relations between the two countries.

Depicting a red maple leaf and a blue Star of David, both comprised of human figures, the stamp is worth $1.70 in Canada and 4.60 shekels in Israel.

"CUPW recognizes that Israel is a democracy and has taken steps to end discrimination against lesbian and gay citizens," Denis Lemelin, national president of the postal union, wrote in a recent letter to the head of Canada Post.

"However, we are puzzled about the concept of shared values with a country that has consistently ignored United Nations and World Court decisions in regards to the ongoing occupation of the West Bank and Gaza... Sadly, in Israel there are still over 20 laws that discriminate against the Palestinian national minority on such basic issues as education, jobs, land ownership and access to public resources."

Lemelin's letter goes on to cite Israeli violations of UN resolutions, its building of a "separation wall" and ongoing discrimination against Palestinians.

The editor of Canadian Stamp News, Charles Verge, also took a swipe at the joint stamp, writing that "I am amazed and mystified by the totally political nature of this stamp."

Not everyone agrees with this stance, however. Canada Post spokesperson John Caines said that CUPW's opinion does not reflect that of Canada Post.

"The stamp has been issued. It's out. It's just their reaction... it's got no impact on the stamp at all," he said.

Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber agrees. "The fact of the matter is the stamp is out there. It's a legal stamp. It's a stamp that's celebrated by many people, many Canadians who understand the shared values between Canada and Israel," he said.

Farber doesn't think Lemelin's letter reflects popular opinion either.

"You have your grassroots membership and then you have the leadership of CUPW. I think it's fair to say there will be many times when the grassroots will not be in sync with the leadership," he said.

"I doubt that a letter from Lemelin will have the kind of effect that he is trying to generate. I think most Canadians get it. I think most postal workers get it."

He said the stamp represents a connection between Israel and Canada.

"The stamp recognizes the fact that, even though thousands of miles separate us, we share a common understanding of human rights, we share a common understanding of democratic values," he said. "I'm proud of the fact that the Canadian government is celebrating the two countries."

'The bill will lead to deep divisions'

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto stated that it "strongly supports the Jewish Federations of North America in its opposition to the proposed conversion bill before the Knesset.

"The bill will lead to deep divisions among Jews throughout the Diaspora and potentially alienate millions of Jews from Israel. At a time when anti-Israel forces are aggressively questioning the legitimacy of a Jewish state, such legislation diverts Diaspora communities from the urgent need to collectively advocate for Israel's well-being," said federation president and CEO Ted Sokolsky.

UJA Federation said it was "particularly concerned about a provision of the legislation that would, in effect, alter the Law of Return by denying converts to Judaism automatic citizenship if they came to Israel before their conversion.

"There is no need for this change," Sokolsky said. "It will create two categories of immigrants and deny one category a stake in the Jewish state where they have chosen to live."

Andrés Spokoiny, executive director of Federation CJA in Montreal, was not reachable for comment at press time.

The bill, proposed by Knesset member David Rotem of the Yisrael Beiteinu party, would permit conversions by local rabbis across Israel who were appointed by the Chief Rabbinate. It would deny citizenship under the Law of Return to those who were converted after they immigrated to Israel.

Following a recommendation in 1998 by the Ne'eman Commission looking at conversion in Israel, the state established a commission led by Rabbi Haim Druckman to facilitate conversions of hundreds of thousands of Russian immigrants. Thought the conversions were finalized by Orthodox rabbis, clergy from Reform and Conservative Judaism were involved in preparing olim as part of the process.

The legitimacy of those conversions was questioned by haredi rabbinical courts, which in some cases nullified them. In Jewish tradition, conversions have not been questioned by other rabbis, and conversions overall were the province of local rabbis.

In Canada, at least one Orthodox rabbi expressed misgivings about the Israeli conversion bill. Montreal Rabbi Reuben Poupko, spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron, said "the bill is problematic on many grounds. It got rid of Druckman [conversion courts] and put a monopoly into the hands of the Chief Rabbinate, in the hands of the haredi community.

> 'In Jewish tradition, conversions have not been questioned by other rabbis, and conversions overall were the province of local rabbis'

"The most mainstream Orthodox religious groups were disenfranchised, let alone other streams of Judaism," he said.

Rabbi Poupko said the root of the problem is the absence in Israel of the principle of separation of church and state.

"Why does Israel even have a conversion bill? It doesn't make sense," he said.

In the early days of the state, authority over religious issues was granted to the observant community, but that situation has grown "anachronistic over the decades," he said. A religious bureaucracy has evolved "that has only served to undermine respect for religion in Israel."

Rabbi Poupko, past president of the Montreal Board of Rabbis, believes respect for religion in Israel would only increase if the political and religious realms were separated.

"The Jewish People survived a long time without the artificial support of a government behind it. Rabbis were able to negotiate between different kinds of conversions and divorces without the seal of approval of a government," he said.

Israeli Jews would likely have more respect for their faith if religion was unencumbered by political considerations and was not "an instrument of coercion in the hands of the haredi rabbis," he added.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Ottawa's Machzikei Hadas Congregation, said, "There's no question something needed to be done about the issue of integrating the Russians Jewishly into the population."

"If the motivation for this legislation is in order to facilitate the conversion of Russians and integrate them into the Israeli mainstream, then we can do nothing but applaud it. But from the way it's being done, it seems there are some add-ons to it that simply make no sense."

Rabbi Bulka, a former co-president of Canadian Jewish Congress, said he supports "an expanded approach" as recommended by the Ne'eman Commission, to integrate Russian olim through additional rabbinical courts.

Rabbi Moshe Stern of the Orthodox Shaarei Tefillah Congregation in Toronto, said, "Whenever Jews are divided among themselves, it is very unhealthy. We have in the world so many enemies. I think any issue that divides us can only lend aid and comfort to those who seek to do us harm."

However, he continued, "there is a system and halachic grounds for proper conversions. When you go outside that system and demand recognition, I think they are the ones causing a disservice to the unity of the Jewish people."

Rabbi Stern rejected suggestions haredim are calling the shots in Israel. "The haredim don't have control over the situation. It is in the control of the Chief Rabbinate, and I support them and their decisions."

He said converts should conform to the halachic process. "There are clergy and groups who've gone outside the parameters of Torah and Halachah but who want to be accepted regardless... What do they want us to do, compromise our principles?"

Correction

In the article "Toronto cantor perfects his own cheesecake recipe" (May 13), the quantity of graham cracker crumbs used for the crust was omitted. The correct amount is one cup. The CJN regrets the error.

Declare interest in a 'just peace,' prof advises Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A declaration from Israel stating that a "just peace" is in its strategic interest would help counter the perception that it's a colonial and apartheid state, says Ruth Gavison, a Hebrew University law professor and a founding member of the Association for Civil Rights in Israel.

Speaking at the University of Toronto last week, Gavison said Israel should make it clear it wants to end its occupation of the West Bank.

By doing so, Israel would be better able to challenge the ongoing anti-Israel campaign of demonization, delegitimization and divestment, she suggested in a speech.

Gavison, an authority in human rights, said Israel's well-being and survival depend on its willingness to acknowledge and accept Palestinian statehood.

She added that the Palestinians' success in winning international support and recognition for their cause has been predicated on Israel's failure to define itself in terms of its future borders.

But in a warning, she disputed the notion that "everything will be fine" if Israel withdraws from the West Bank. She did not elaborate.

In a survey of its current challenges, Gavison said that Israel faces a "very, very bad situation," since it's widely regarded as an oppressive state and a threat to peace and order.

"It's very troubling," she noted.

Flaying the forces demonizing and delegitimizing Israel, Gavison dismissed accusations that Israel is a colonial and apartheid state, calling them "untrue and unfair."

She urged the international community to reject these charges, but added that Israel itself is partially to blame for its unpopularity because it has not sufficiently dealt with its four-decade occupation of the West Bank.

Given its image, Israel should announce it is a state bound by international law. "It's the moral and wise thing to do," she observed.

However, Israel has the right to question interpretations of international law, she said.

Citing the 1917 Balfour Declaration and the 1947 United Nations Palestine partition plan, Gavison said the Zionist movement always understood the need to enlist international support for its goals and worked ceaselessly to advance its case through intense diplomacy. As a result, Israel ensured its legitimacy under international law, she said.

Gavison discussed the United Nations 2009 Goldstone report, which claimed that Israel and Hamas both committed war crimes in the Gaza Strip.

The report, based on a fact-finding mission led by South African Jewish judge Richard Goldstone at the behest of the UN's Human Rights Council, was criticized by the Israeli government.

Though she acknowledged that the council has an anti-Israel track record and that the Goldstone report didn't address the key issue of asymmetrical warfare, she said Israel isn't above criticism and would have been well advised to respond to Goldstone's accusations in an attempt to defuse them.

Suggesting there are two lessons to be learned from the report, Gavison called on Israel to establish a commission to monitor the actions of the Israeli armed forces and urged the UN to ensure that its representative bodies are not politicized.

Although she praised the vitality of Israeli democracy, Gavison expressed concern about Israelis who try to delegitimize the views of fellow citizens with whom they disagree.

In another observation, she said that strains of moral righteousness and superiority in Judaism could be "very dangerous" if coupled with force.

And in a veiled critique of the way Israeli Arabs are treated, she said that Israel should accept its international obligations on this matter.

Gavison's talk was sponsored by the Joseph and Gertie Schwartz Memorial Lecture, the Lipson Memorial Lecture and the Louis and Rachel Lesk Memorial Fund in Israeli Studies.

Politicians, young Jews mingle

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — More than 300 young Jewish adults mingled with politicians from all levels of government at a swank get-together on the 46th-floor penthouse of a downtown office building.

It was the second annual Montreal "Action Party" organized by the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC), which was founded five years ago with the aim of building relationships with elected officials from all political parties across the country and encouraging Jews of all ages to engage in the political process.

PHILIP M. KRAVETSKY ז"ל
Shraga Feivel Mordechai
Winnipeg, Manitoba

Phil Kravetsky passed away on April 14, 2010 (30 Nissan 5770) at the age of 86. He was the son of the late Charles and Ethel Kravetsky; he was predeceased by his wife, Deena (nee Zlatin). He was also predeceased by 10 of his 11 siblings, by his son-in-law Dov Patkin, granddaughter Gitti Patkin and his great-granddaughter Mindle Samet.

He is survived by his children, Michelle and David Hamer (Sharon MA), Shayna Patkin (Jerusalem), Bas-Sheva and Eliyohu Simmonds, Rocky and Barb'ra Kravetsky, Sandra and David Friedman (Baltimore MD), Mark and Sharon Kravetsky, Charles Kravetsky (Hamilton ON), Ahuva Kravetsky, and Jack Kravetsky and Esther Tock (Toronto ON) as well as 44 grandchildren, 96 great grandchildren and 6 great-great grandchildren. Also surviving him are his brother Marvin and sister-in-law Carol (Toronto ON), his brother-in-law Lloyd Friedman and his sisters-in-law Goldie Kravetsky and Jean Zlatin (Halifax NS).

Phil attended St. John's High School and worked briefly as a bookkeeper for Public Abatoir before enlisting in the RCAF in 1942. After his discharge from the air force, Phil worked as a public accountant. In 1951 he and his brothers Cecil, Wilfred, and Marvin began a business partnership in the transportation and distribution industry that continued for half a century and at its peak had operations in 6 provinces.

Together with Deena, Phil was involved in many community and charitable organizations. Amongst others, he was president of the Libavicher Synagogue for over 30 years and remained its honourary president thereafter. Phil was the driving force behind the establishment of the Chabad Mikvah. He was a founding trustee of the Chavurat Tefila Synagogue, the long time Regional Vice-President of Mizrachi Organization of Canada, served on the Vaad Ha'ir, on the board of the Chesed Shel Emes and served the Talmud Torah, Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, I.L. Peretz School in various capacities. Phil's newest great grandson born in Israel, on April 11 was named, April 19, Shraga Feivel Mordechai as an honour to his memory. Proud parents are Phil's Grandson Nachliel Dror and wife Rochel (Harbater) Friedman.

A fund in his memory has been established in support of the construction of the new Jewish Learning Centre of Winnipeg. Contributions may be made in care of Lubavitch Centre, 2095 Sinclair Street, Winnipeg R2V 3K2 (www.chabadwinnipeg.org) or the charity of your choice.

Kosher food store opens in Kelowna

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

KELOWNA, B.C. — The Okanagan seems an unlikely place for a food and Judaica store, with a Jewish community of only 1,000 in the entire valley. But it has one, thanks to Michele Troup and Mila Shapiro, who opened Mem's Kosher Foods & Holyland Treasures in Kelowna on March 15, just in time for Passover.

The store sells kosher meat, poultry, fish, knishes and desserts, as well as giftware, and is launching a Jewish deli before the end of May. "It's not a kosher deli because I don't have access to kosher challah," says Troup. "But with the exception of the rye bread with caraway seeds, everything in there will be kosher. We're planning to offer tabouli, hummus, garlic dip, sandwiches, soups and towards the end of the week, brisket on a bun."

Mem's meats, imported from eastern Canada, Vancouver and New York, have been top sellers – and not just among Jewish community members. "We also carry Turkish coffee, Bamba [snack foods], Kedem grape juices, 778 jams from Israel, and many other products," Troup says.

Shapiro, 36, moved to the Okanagan from Israel and previously worked as a computer technician. Troup is 49 and still serves as the office administrator for the Okanagan Jewish Community. The pair have stocked their 1,600-square-foot store with cookbooks, educational books, Passover plates, jewelry, music, kosher candy, giftware, toys and cards.

Their opening has not been without adversity. By the end of August, Mem's will be relocating into as-yet-unknown new premises because their present location, at 3010 Pandosy St., will be torn down. The developer of a new condominium and retail project, Sopa Square, has approached Shapiro and Troup about opening a store in the square, but that project's completion is still a year away.

Still, the two are determined to make Mem's work and find a new home for their deli, groceries and Judaica. "There was a need for this store," Troup says. "There was nowhere local to obtain anything Jewish or kosher – you had to travel to Vancouver or have your family ship it to you. Particularly on Passover, we couldn't get any of the products we needed, and Safeway stopped carrying things for us."

"This store is our mitzvah. We're raising our children here, and it's very, very hard to do that in a Jewish way without losing our traditions and beliefs. We're trying to price our goods right so that Jews who want to can follow the laws and keep kosher."

For more information about Mem's, call 778-478-0244.

JNF: 3 dinners; 4 honorees

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Over the next month, JNF Ontario region will honour four individuals across the province in three separate Negev Dinner galas.

First up is the Hamilton Negev Dinner on May 30. The event will toast Phil Rosenshein and Ben Sauder, friends for more than 80 years and two stalwarts of the city's Jewish community.

Keynote speaker for the event is actor and director Henry Winkler, best known as "The Fonz" on the 1970's sitcom Happy Days.

Funds from the dinner will go to the creation of the Hillel Landsman Park, to be built in Hastor Hagelilit, a development town in northern Israel.

The dinner will take place at the Hamilton Convention Centre. For more information, call 905-527-5516.

The second dinner, in Windsor, on June 8, will honour Sandra Pupatello, Ontario's minister of economic development and trade.

JNF said it chose Pupatello for her longstanding support of the organization and its projects in Israel. Pupatello will be part of delegation joining Premier Dalton McGuinty on his visit to Israel at the end of the month.

Money raised at this dinner will go toward the completion of a wastewater treatment facility in Yeruham, a community about 30 kilometres south of Be'er Sheva.

The Windsor gala's keynote speaker will be U.S. Ambassador to Canada David Jacobson. This dinner will take place at the Caboto Club (2175 Parent Ave.). For more information, call 519- 969-8733.

Lastly, in London, Ont., on June 13, JNF will pay tribute to Dr. Calvin Stiller, the physician credited with establishing the use of the drug Cyclosporine for preventing rejection in transplant patients.

The scheduled keynote speaker is former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton. The gala will be held at the Best Western Lamplighter Inn (591 Wellington Rd. S.). For details, call 519-432 2139.

Funds raised at this tribute dinner will go towards the creation of a play area for the students of Shehafim School, a special education facility that caters to Arab, Druze, Bedouin and Jewish children with physical and cognitive disabilities. It's located in the community of Meva'ot HaHermon in the Upper Galilee.

Pro-Israel MP resigns to run for mayor of Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Judy Wasylycia-Leis, long one of Israel's and Canadian Jewry's best friends in the House of Commons, has resigned her seat to run for mayor of Winnipeg in the upcoming election in October.

The former NDP MP for Winnipeg North has decided to challenge two-time incumbent Sam Katz, the city's Jewish mayor, for the top job in what should be an exciting race between two high-profile candidates.

In an interview with The CJN, Wasylycia-Leis noted that she was sitting at 36 per cent in a poll taken in March, before she officially declared her intention to contest the mayoral election. In the same poll, Katz was the choice of 51 per cent of respondents, while three other potential candidates divided the remaining support.

But now, with the three other candidates having removed themselves from consideration in deference to Wasylycia-Leis, she estimates that she's likely around 40 per cent in the polls.

"I think I'm within striking distance," she said. "I'm putting together a strong team [headed by Liberal senator and former Manitoba Liberal leader Sharon Carstairs]. One of my challenges is to get people excited enough to come out and vote."

(The turnout in civic elections here has historically been low, except when there has been a compelling mayoral race.)

Wasylycia-Leis, 58, is originally from Kitchener, Ont., and comes from a Ukrainian and Dutch background. "I grew up with a sense of social justice and community activism," she said.

After graduating from the University of Waterloo, she headed to Ottawa, where she worked as a policy planning consultant for the New Democratic Party. She later served as executive assistant to party leader Ed Broadbent and as women's organizer for the federal NDP. She ran unsuccessfully in three attempts to be elected to Ontario legislature while in Ottawa.

She moved to Manitoba in 1982 to work as executive assistant to newly elected NDP Premier Howard Pawley and later co-ordinated the Women's Directorate in the Manitoba government.

It was after settling in north Winnipeg that she first became exposed to members of the Jewish community, both as neighbours and through her work with the NDP. In north Winnipeg, there was traditionally strong support for the NDP from among the Jewish community.

"Through my Jewish friends, I became more aware of Jewish issues and developed a real interest in Israel," she said.

She was elected to the Manitoba legislature in the 1986 provincial election in the north-end Winnipeg riding of St. John's and was appointed minister of culture, heritage and recreation with responsibility for the status of women and the Manitoba Lotteries Foundation. In 1988, the Pawley government was defeated on a budget vote and while Wasylycia-Leis held her seat, the NDP dropped to third place in the legislature.

In 1993, she resigned her seat to run federally for the NDP. That was the election in which the Liberals swept the country, reducing the formerly ruling Tories to two seats and the NDP to nine seats.

Wasylycia-Leis also lost, but she spent the next four years doing volunteer work and preparing to run again in the next election. She was elected to Parliament in 1997.

Wasylycia-Leis recalled that her first highlight there was getting a motion passed to have labels placed on all liquor bottles warning pregnant women about the dangers of fetal alcohol syndrome. She regrets that the measure, once passed, was never implemented.

Her second highlight, she said, was having her 2003 motion to introduce a National Holocaust Remembrance Day receive unanimous approval.

While an MP, she visited Israel twice on Canada-Israel Committee missions – most recently coinciding with Israel's 60th anniversary celebrations – and she went to Poland on a Holocaust studies tour under the auspices of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre. She was also a longstanding member of the Canadian Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Anti-Semitism.

"I may disagree with some Israeli government actions," she said, "but I stand squarely behind Israel's right to exist and to defend itself."

She said she decided to come back to Winnipeg to run for mayor in response to huge demand. "I think Winnipeg is at a crossroads," she said. "This city has great potential which hasn't been realized yet."

She said she plans to spend the next few weeks meeting with Winnipeg community groups before she starts to unveil her platform for the fall campaign.

Shavuot: so very dairy good!

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Shavuot is always associated with the eating of dairy dishes. Dishes such as cheesecakes, blintzes, kugels and cheese bagels, rich in milk, cheese, sour cream and butter, are typical Shavuot fare.

Without a doubt, the queen of cheesecakes is Marcy Goldman, a Montreal-based cookbook author and freelance food writer. Her popular website BetterBaking.com has 20,000 regular subscribers and about one million visitors a month.

Her best-selling baking bible, The Best of BetterBaking.com, is now back in print – and it's better than ever. You'll still find all the original fail-safe, triple-tested recipes in the new edition, along with 30 new recipes and new photos that will make you hungry for more! Recipes range from contemporary to classic, traditional to trendy, with one common ingredient – excellence! Tips on baking techniques and quality tools and ingredients as well as a Source Guide will provide you with the confidence, skills and resources to get perfect results every time.

Goldman has also updated her kitchen classic, A Treasury of Jewish Holiday Baking: 10th Anniversary Edition (Whitecap). Briefly out of print, this new edition includes a bonus chapter with 35 new recipes that will make any holiday celebration complete. The book is a culinary treasure certain to be handed down, passed around and enjoyed by many generations to come.

SWEET CHEESE CORNFLAKE-TOPPED DAIRY KUGEL

Source: A Treasury of Jewish Holiday Baking: 10th Anniversary Edition

This is perfect for Shavuot or a Shabbat luncheon, as a dairy main dish (served with a soup and salad) or for break-the-fast on Yom Kippur. The recipe doubles easily and can be offered with sour cream, fresh fruit or even warm blueberry sauce. The vanilla gives it a contemporary flavour and makes it lean toward a dessert dish.

2 (10-12 oz.) packages egg noodles
1/3 cup melted unsalted butter or oil
6 eggs, lightly beaten
1 cup sour cream
1 cup dry or pot-style cottage cheese (without curds)
1 1/2 tsp. pure vanilla extract (optional)
1/2 cup sugar
pinch of salt

Cornflake Streusel Topping:
1 cup cornflake cereal
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
1 tbsp. sugar

Prepare the noodles according to package directions; drain and place in a large bowl. Spray a 9x13-inch pan with nonstick cooking spray and place on a baking sheet lined with parchment paper. Preheat oven to 350.

When the noodles have cooled to almost room temperature, combine with the butter, eggs, sour cream, cottage cheese, vanilla, sugar and salt. Spoon the noodles into the prepared pan.

Place the cornflakes, cinnamon and sugar in a Ziploc bag and roll over it with a rolling pin to crush the cereal. Sprinkle the "cornflake streusel" over the noodles. Bake until the top lightly browns, about 1 hour. Serves 8 to 12.

Gala to raise money for brain tumour centre

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The annual gala that raises funds for the Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Tumour Centre at the Princess Margaret Hospital will be held this year on May 26 at the Liberty Grand Entertainment Complex.

The centre was founded by the late businessman Gerry Pencer, who was diagnosed with a brain tumour 12 years ago.

Holly Pencer Bellman, Pencer's daughter and executive director of the centre, said that when her father was diagnosed, there wasn't a consolidated treatment facility.

"Surgery was in one place and treatment in another. If we needed information or support, we went somewhere else," Pencer Bellman said.

Her father decided he would change that, she said, and before he died, he pledged $4 million to Princess Margaret Hospital to start the centre.

Pencer Bellman said her father was involved in creating the centre, and "it is exactly his vision. He's all around it."

The largest of its kind in Canada, the centre is 5,700 square feet and takes up half of the 18th floor of the hospital.

"The Pencer Centre has blossomed into the leading multi-disciplinary facility of its kind in North America, regularly held up as a model for similar organizations the world over," she said.

The waiting room of the Pencer Centre

"Not only a state of the art treatment and research facility, it's home to 5,200 patients and their families each year. It's a place where patients can visit with their families, participate in workshops, hang out and have coffee with a friend, talk to a [therapist] or relax in the library with a book."

The Pencer Centre has also developed an international reputation as a significant contributor to leading-edge research, she added.

"Ongoing studies conducted at the Pencer Centre have led to the establishment of a new standard of care for patients, like [my father] who are diagnosed each year with the most aggressive type of brain tumour.

"Not only is this new treatment protocol extending the life of patients, but it has also stimulated the explosion of interest in expanding the limits of conventional treatments as well as exploring novel treatments for other brain tumours," Pencer Bellman said.

For information on the gala, call 416-923-2999 or visit pencerbraintrust.com.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:
"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.
The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.
Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."
The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

TOY DESIGNERS AID ZAREINU MOVEATHON

Rachel Fuhrer, left, and Sean Fuss joined fellow Grade 8 students at Leo Baeck Day School's Thornhill campus to create toys for children with mental and physical disabilities as part of the Zareinu Educational Centre "Design-a-toy Project." The toys will be on display at the Zareinu Moveathon on Sunday, June 13.

Breast cancer specialist urges increased funding to fight disease

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Much more money needs to be poured into cancer prevention activities, says Dr. Ellen Warner, a physician whose practice is devoted to breast cancer.

An associate professor of medicine at the University of Toronto, Warner was a principal investigator of a study of the frequency of BRCA1/BRCA2 mutations among Jewish women with breast cancer.

She spoke recently at a program called Taking Charge of Our Health, sponsored by L'Chaim Cancer Support for Jewish Women, a project of National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section.

Also on the program was Dr. Barry Rosen, associate professor of obstetrics and gynecology at U of T and head of gynecologic oncology at both the University Health Network and U of T; Tanya Giaquinto, a registered dietician, and Brenda Baskind, an inspirational speaker.

Warner said that we need to put "tons of pressure on the government, and we need to be activists. Politicians don't care about cancer prevention."

Drug companies, as well, have little interest in research into cancer prevention, she said. "They need to increase their funding."

To prevent cancer, said Warner, we have to understand how it develops. "Genes become damaged, either by chance, by radiation, by chemicals or by a virus, and make the cells malfunction. Preventing cancer means we have to prevent damage to our genes."

Dr. Ellen Warner

The number 1 risk factor for cancer is aging, she said, "but half of cancers are preventable."

First of all, Warner advised, "don't smoke. Lung cancer is the leading cause of cancer death in Canadian women, and smoking also increases the risk of other cancers. It's never too late to quit and to get the benefits from quitting."

Sun protection is also essential, she said. "The ozone layer is thinning, and a lot more ultraviolet rays are getting through. You must protect yourself.

"Number 30 [sunscreen] is the highest protection necessary, but don't rely on sunscreen. Stay out of the sun. Being fair-skinned is the sign of a smart, healthy woman."

She said that screening needs to be done for breast, colon and cervical cancers. Screening is crucial, because a lot of tests find lesions that are not yet cancer.

"Know your family history, and talk to your doctor about it. Some people inherit a defective gene from their parents, and if the doctor finds you have an increased risk, he may refer you for genetic counselling. You may be a candidate for a clinical trial."

Rosen said that screening for ovarian cancer is a problem, because a number of symptoms aren't specific to that disease. "All of us get these symptoms, and if we wait until we get other symptoms, it's often too late. If ovarian cancer could be detected in stage 1, it would be 90 per cent curable. A lot of effort is being put into finding the right test, but [we] haven't found it yet."

Jewish women have a mutation of the BRCA genes more commonly than any other population, he said, but that could be an advantage, "because [then] you are in a position to prevent [those diseases.]

"If you know it's in your family, then you're in a position to change the course of your history."

Currently, he said, 2,500 women a year are diagnosed with ovarian cancer, and 1,500 die. "I am encouraged, however, with the research that is developing. There is a lot of awareness and we are doing all that we can. I think that the future is bright."

Tanya Giaquinto advised women to be "as lean as possible, move your bodies, and eat mostly foods that are of plant origin. Limit your amount of animal foods, avoid processed meat, and reduce your salt."

Russia reportedly signs arms deal with Syria

By NATASHA MOZGOVAYA
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Russia has signed deals with Syria under which it will sell it warplanes, anti-tank weapons and air defence systems, the Itar-Tass news agency quoted a senior Russian arms trader as saying on May 14.

Mikhail Dmitriyev, head of the Federal Service for Military-Technical Cooperation, said Russia would supply Syria with MiG-29 fighters and truck-mounted Pantsir short-range surface-to-air missiles and anti-aircraft artillery systems.

He didn't specify the kind of anti-tank weapons.

The arms deal is likely to be watched with unease by the United States, which imposed sanctions on Damascus for its support of terror groups and corruption.

Earlier last week, Russian President Dmitry Medvedev visited Syria – the first visit to Damascus by a Russian ruler since the 1917 Bolshevik revolution – and oversaw talks on Russia's possible assistance in building a nuclear power plant in Syria.

While in Syria, Medvedev also met with Khaled Meshal, the exiled leader of the Palestinian Islamist group Hamas.

Israel's Foreign Ministry said it was "deeply disappointed" that Medvedev met the leader of Hamas, which it said is "a terror organization in every way."

In related developments, a top U.S. State Department official said Russia must take into account Syria's problematic nuclear stance before considering co-operation with Damascus over nuclear power.

The May 12 comments from spokesperson Philip Crowley followed reports that Medvedev and his Syrian counterpart, Bashar Assad, had discussed the possibility of nuclear collaboration in Damascus earlier in the week.

"Co-operation [with Syria] on atomic energy could get a second wind," Medvedev told reporters May 11, but he gave no further details on what form the collaboration might take.

Russian news agencies quoted Assad as saying that he had discussed with Medvedev the possibility of building power plants, including nuclear ones, in Syria.

Russian President Dmitry Medvedev

In September 2007, Israeli warplanes bombed a site in eastern Syria that the U.S. later claimed was a nuclear installation aimed at building an atomic bomb with aid from North Korea.

Syria is a signatory to the international Non-Proliferation Treaty, which forbid member states from seeking nuclear weapons, while Russia is one of a handful of states permitted nuclear arms under the treaty.

Crowley told reporters that Washington is cautious about any nuclear deal that includes Syria.

Asked May 13 whether the United States approved of a possible nuclear bond between Russia and Syria, Crowley said NPT signatories, including Russia, have "special responsibilities".

"All members have rights, but all members also have responsibilities," he said, adding: "What concerns us is Syria has not answered questions that have been raised about its compliance with the NPT and all countries that contemplate energy co-operation need to take that into account."

Turkey makes nuclear deal with Iran

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Turkish Prime Minister Tayyip Erdogan said on Monday he saw no need for United Nations Security Council sanctions after Iran agreed to send some of its uranium abroad.

Iran signed an agreement late Sunday with mediators Brazil and Turkey for a nuclear fuel swap designed to allay international concern over the Islamic Republic's atomic ambitions and avert fresh sanctions on Tehran.

Iran said it had agreed to swap 1,200 kilograms of its low-enriched uranium for higher-enriched nuclear fuel, to be used in a medical research reactor. The exchange would take place in Turkey, Foreign Ministry spokesperson Ramin Mehmanparast said.

Iran, which rejects western accusations it is seeking to develop nuclear bombs, had earlier insisted such a swap must take place on its territory.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad called on six world powers, which have been discussing further UN sanctions on the major oil producer, for fresh talks on Iran's nuclear program after the fuel exchange agreement.

Turkish Prime Minister Tayyip Erdogan

"Following the signing of the nuclear fuel swap deal, it is time for [five permanent UN Security Council members and Germany] to enter talks with Iran based on honesty, justice and mutual respect," Ahmadinejad said.

There was no immediate comment from Washington, which has been leading a western push to impose additional punitive measures on Tehran.

Turkey and Brazil, both non-permanent members of the UN Security Council, had offered to mediate to find a resolution to the impasse. It was seen as the last chance to avoid a fourth round of UN sanctions.

Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva and Turkish Prime Minister Tayyip Erdogan discussed the deal with Ahmadinejad in Tehran, Iranian state media reported.

"The swap will take place in Turkey," Mehmanparast told reporters, shortly before the agreement was signed by ministers in front of reporters.

Mehmanparast said Iran would send low-enriched uranium to Turkey within a month, and that it would be under the supervision of the UN nuclear agency, state Press TV reported.

Major world powers had urged Iran to accept a months-old International Atomic Energy Agency plan to ship 1,200 kilograms of its low-enriched uranium – enough for a single bomb if purified to a high enough level – abroad for transformation into fuel for a medical research reactor.

The proposal, backed by the United States, Russia and France, was aimed at giving time for diplomatic talks with Iran.

Tehran agreed in principle to the deal in October but then demanded changes such as a simultaneous swap on Iranian soil, conditions other parties in the deal said were unacceptable.

Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said Turkey would be obliged to return Iran's low-enriched uranium "immediately and unconditionally" if Monday's agreement between Iran, Brazil and Turkey was not implemented.

"Based on the agreement signed this morning, if the swap does not take place, then Turkey will be obliged to send back our dispatched uranium immediately and unconditionally," Mottaki said.

Trita Parsi, director of Washington-based National Iranian American Council, said a potential breakthrough had been made in the long-running dispute, saying Turkey and Brazil had succeeded in filling a "trust gap."

"But will the deal be satisfactory to the U.S.? With the details remaining unknown, it's impossible to speculate," Parsi said in an e-mail comment.

U.S. to fund missile defence

The Obama administration authorized $205 million to let Israel to complete its Iron Dome short-range missile defence system. "As the president has repeatedly said, our commitment to Israel's security is unshakable and our defence relationship is stronger than ever," a White House statement said. "The United States and our ally Israel share many of the same security challenges, from combating terrorism to confronting the threat posed by Iran's nuclear-weapons program. The president recognizes the threat missiles and rockets fired by Hamas and Hezbollah pose to Israelis, and has therefore decided to seek funding from Congress to support the production of Israel's short range rocket defence system called Iron Dome." A senior administration official set the figure at $205 million and said it was over and above the $3 billion that the United States annually allocates to Israel in defence assistance. The Obama administration is sustaining and in some cases increasing defence assistance to Israel partly as a means to encourage Israel to advance peace talks with the Palestinians.

Woman attacked for tfillin marks

A woman was attacked in Be'er Sheva reportedly for having the imprints of tfillin lines visible on her arms. Noa Raz was physically assaulted by a haredi man in Be'er Sheva's Central Bus Station, where she was waiting for a bus to her job in Tel Aviv, according to the Israel Religious Action Center. According to the centre, the man asked Raz twice if the imprints were from tfillin. When she told him they were, he began to kick and strangle her while screaming "women are an abomination." Raz, a Conservative Jew, reportedly broke free from the man and boarded her bus. Raz is a member of Women of the Wall, which holds a monthly Rosh Chodesh women's prayer service at the Western Wall. In March, haredi men threw chairs at the women as they prepared to pray at the Wall. Raz filed a report with the police about the incident. The Israel Religious Action Center called on Be'er Sheva police to treat the assault as a hate crime.

Hamas inclusion rejected

Israel's Foreign Ministry rejected a call by the presidents of Russia and Turkey to include Hamas in the peace process. In a joint news conference May 12 in Ankara, Russia's Dmitry Medvedev and Turkey's Abdullah Gul said Hamas should not be excluded from the current peace process. Gul said peace could not be achieved without Hamas' involvement. Israel's Foreign Ministry last week condemned Medvedev's meeting with Hamas leader Khaled Meshal in Damascus. "Israel has always stood behind Russia in its fight against Chechen terrorism and we expect similar treatment in the case of Hamas terrorism against Israel," the ministry said. "Hamas is a terrorist organization in every sense of the word. Its declared purpose is the destruction of the State of Israel."

Ethiopians remembered

A memorial service was held for the some 4,000 Jewish Ethiopians who died making their way to Israel. The annual state service was held May 12 near a memorial erected on Mount Herzl by the Absorption and Immigration Ministry in memory of those who died during the trek to the Jewish state. Speakers included family members of the dead, as well as Israeli President Shimon Peres and Absorption Minister Sofa Landver. "This journey is the closest to the story of the Exodus from Egypt," Landver said at the event. "The price of the exodus from Ethiopia was especially high." Landver said Israel's aliyah operation has yet to be completed, and she said she will soon fly to Ethiopia in an effort to expedite the Ethiopians' arrival. – Files from JTA

New Schechter Institute campus launched in Jerusalem

Torontonians instrumental

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Several Torontonians were honoured in absentia May 4 at the dedication of the Schechter Institute – Legacy Heritage Center for Jewish Studies in Jerusalem, the pluralistic Jewish educational centre's new main campus and national headquarters.

A central part of the institute's 25th anniversary celebrations, the dedication ceremony was attended by Natan Sharansky, the chairman of the Jewish Agency and a former Knesset member, along with hundreds of graduates and supporters.

"We have some wonderful donors in Toronto," said Rabbi David Golinkin, president of the Schechter Institute and the centre's Jerome and Miriam Katzin Professor of Jewish Studies. Not only have Toronto donors contributed significantly to the new campus, he said, but it's also thanks to the longtime support of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto that the institute was able to open a TALI school branch in Eilat. TALI schools and preschools offer Israeli children a pluralistic education.

Among the Canadian honorees who contributed to the $8.2-million Schechter Institute campus were Harold and Carol Wolfe, Ab and Phyllis Flatt, Shoel Silver (through the Nathan and Lily Silver Family Foundation), and Barry and Paula Sonshine (in honour of Mildred Sonshine and in memory of Joseph Sonshine).

The new building, located in Givat Ram next to the Israel Museum, is slated to open in September, in time for the new academic year. Its five storeys and 2,300 square metres will be home to the Liebhaber Center for Jewish Education; the Harvey L. Miller Family Bet Midrash (study hall) for students of the Schechter Rabbinical Seminary, which trains rabbis for the Masorti/Conservative movement; 14 classrooms and lecture halls for the more than 600 educators enrolled in the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies Graduate School MA program; the TALI Education Fund Pedagogic Center, the Institute's nationwide Jewish studies enrichment program for secular public schools and kindergartens; and a new expanded library.

Until now all of these activities have been housed in a building that used to serve as a Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) dormitory, dating back to 1963. "It was totally inadequate for what we do. It was not meant as a space for learning," said Rabbi Golinkin. "We really needed this new building." The old building will be converted into administrative offices.

The old building also wasn't large enough to accommodate the institute's rapid expansion. Since it was founded in 1985, the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies has grown from a four-student learning group into a multi-faceted educational facility with programs serving more than 40,000 students across Israel and in Ukraine, including modern Orthodox, traditional, Reform, secular, and even a few non-Jews. The MA program is the largest Jewish studies program in Israel, with more than 1,000 graduates. The TALI school program has been implemented in 184 schools and preschools across Israel and enrolment is expected to reach 40,000 children this fall. Midreshet Yerushalayim, the institute's Jewish learning program for Russian-speaking immigrants and Jewish communities in Ukraine, recently expanded in Israel to include a learning program for Hebrew speakers. Over the last decade, the institute's full-time faculty has doubled and its library stacks have more than tripled.

"We take this as a good sign that our mission – to spread Jewish learning throughout the State of Israel as well as the Ukraine – is a worthy one. Now more than ever, secular Jews in Israel are thirsty for Jewish education," said Rabbi Golinkin.

"The State of Israel has accomplished many incredible feats since 1948, but in the areas of Jewish identity and Jewish education we have failed to teach most Israelis about Jewish history, culture and tradition," he said. The only Jewish studies subject taught in Israeli schools is Bible, and it's only required to be taught two hours per week. "It's not enough," added Rabbi Golinkin.

According to a poll published in the Jerusalem Post last July, 59 per cent of Israelis consider their level of Judaic knowledge to be "mediocre or lower." The same poll indicated that 43 per cent of secular Israelis want to increase their knowledge of Judaism.

"There is a growing trend of secular Israelis searching for Jewish meaning," said Rabbi Golinkin. "This is why our institution has grown so rapidly over the last 25 years."

This was the institute's rationale behind opening a centre of learning, The Schechter Center for Jewish Culture – Legacy Heritage Building, in the heart of secular Tel Aviv, in the Neve Tzedek neighbourhood. The $3.2-million facility was also dedicated during the 25th anniversary celebrations.

"We were very overcrowded in Jerusalem, and in Tel Aviv we didn't have a campus at all. Our growth was restricted because of our facilities," said Rabbi Golinkin. "Now we expect all of our programs to continue to grow, as they have been growing for many years."

Cancellation of conference urged after Israeli barred

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canadian doctors are being urged to stay away from a medical conference in Egypt that is proceeding even though an Israeli doctor is being refused entry to the country.

Doctors Against Racism and Anti-Semitism (DARA) is calling on Canadian colleagues to write to the hosting medical organization, the International Society on Thrombosis and Haemostasis (ISTH), urging it to postpone or cancel its 56th Scientific and Standardization Committee (SSC) conference later this month unless Dr. Uri Seligson is permitted to attend. Seligson, a professor of hematology at the Sheba Medical Center of Tel Hashomer Hospital, is chair of the ISTH education committee and two years ago lobbied to permit Cairo to host the event.

DARA vice-chair Rob Zadik said some American doctors have indicated they will boycott the conference because of the refusal of the Egyptian government to permit Seligson to attend.

Zadik is concerned Egypt will similarly prevent other Israeli physicians from participating in the 20th World Congress of the International Association of Surgeons, Gastroenterologists and Oncologists, to be held in Cairo in October.

"This is unacceptable," Zadik said. "This is a country with which Egypt has a treaty. We won't stand for it.

"If this is the behaviour of a country with which Israel has a peace treaty, what is the motivation for Israel to form peace treaties?" he asked.

"This is medicine. There is no room for this kind of behaviour. We won't lay back. We'll do our best to have it cancelled or moved."

As of late last week, there was no indication there would be any changes to the conference. An ISTH spokesperson at the organization's headquarters in Carrboro, N.C., declined to comment about DARA's concerns, referring The CJN to the group's website.

The site contained a letter to colleagues from the president of the Cairo gathering, Nevine Kassim, which, apparently without irony, notes "the natural hospitality of Cairo" and states "the goal of the SSC and the ISTH 'Reach the World' is to share scientific and clinical information in our fields."

> 'If this is the behaviour of a country with which Israel has a peace treaty, what is the motivation for Israel to form peace treaties?'

Reached in Israel by e-mail, Seligson said Egyptian authorities turned down his visa request three times since early March. He decided against a fourth attempt when he learned "there were threats by Egyptian physician and pharmacist organizations to boycott the meeting if Israeli speakers deliver lectures at a satellite session. As a result, the Danish company Novo Nordisk [the sponsor of the session] cancelled the whole session."

"All Israelis cancelled because their lectures were cancelled or out of solidarity," he stated. "Only one visa was issued to an Israeli physician. The others were pending."

Seligson said Egyptian authorities "could have suppressed the threats by the doctors if they wished to do it." Their failure to do so "portrays a sad picture of the peace treaty between Egypt and Israel."

Though he had recommended Cairo as the venue for the May 22-25 conference, Seligson now believes no similar meetings should be scheduled in Egypt unless Israelis are permitted to attend.

In Egypt, meanwhile, the English-language Daily News reported that the head of the Doctors' Syndicate, Hamdy El-Sayyed, said any Egyptian doctor who participates in a conference hosting Israelis would be brought before a disciplinary board.

"Israeli physicians are not allowed to enter Egypt or conduct any kind of medical activities in the country, either," he said.

The Daily News cited the Al-Masry Al-Youm newspaper as reporting that "professors of hematology at Qasr El-Aini, Ain Shams and Alexandria medical schools expressed dissatisfaction toward the participation of two Israeli doctors in the conference. A professor at Qasr El-Aini, Mona Al-Qasas, told Al-Masry Al-Youm that the organizers had invited them [the Israeli doctors], even though Egyptian doctors threatened to boycott the conference."

Zadik noted in a letter to the ISTH that in 2009 the Ontario Medical Association cancelled a continuing medical education event in Dubai after Israeli physicians were disallowed and the American Academy of Emergency Medicine cancelled its endorsement of an international anesthesiology conference in Dubai in March for the same reason.

MUSICIAN GETS AHEAD, STEP BY STEP

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

He visited six concentration camps, walked in silence on the March of the Living and then started singing.

Mark Feldman, a Canadian musician and lead singer of the Mark Feldman Band (MFB), was this year's musical director for the Toronto contingent of the March of the Living, which takes participants on a tour of concentration camps in Poland and then to Israel.

During the trip, Feldman played to a crowd of 7,000 people.

"It was the most moving musical experience of my life. Being on stage and... [having seen] the gates of Auschwitz, the whole thing was really the most surreal experience of my life," he said.

"I really feel every Jew should visit Poland before Israel. It makes you appreciate Israel."

As musical director, he performed after each concentration camp tour and also went from bus to bus, singing some of his own songs.

Before the trip, Feldman was asked to learn 25 Hebrew songs – a difficult feat to do in three months.

"I can read Hebrew, but I can't understand it," he said. "I didn't know any Hebrew songs at all."

Feldman, 30, has been playing music since he was 15. So far, he's released two solo CDs and will release a self-produced CD with MFB in June.

As a singer-songwriter, his music is almost Bob Dylan-esque, though his latest CD is a bit more rock, with catchy lyrics and a bluesy quality.

"There's definitely an edgier sound on this new record. There's a transition from soft pop to more rock," Feldman said, explaining that rock songs work better live. "I've always found, playing live, it's hard to be lax for two hours. I couldn't exude the energy being directed at me."

Feldman had been playing with his band when his second solo CD was released in 2008.

"We just kept playing and getting tighter as a unit. We figured we'd do this one ourselves," he said of the newest CD, called Who's Got to Know?

Feldman and the band turned a cottage into a studio and recorded everything themselves.

"It cost about one-10th what [my last solo CD] did. It gave us some creative control," he said.

Since finishing his CD, Feldman has gone back to his soft rock-pop style.

"[I wanted] to write a song that everyone can sing along to, not scream along to," Feldman said.

Feldman first started writing songs in high school, while in a band.

"When I got to university, I heard songs on the radio and said, 'I can do this. Maybe I will.'"

And he did, but it wasn't easy. Since releasing his first CD in 2004, Feldman has learned to appreciate each accomplishment, no matter how small.

Mark Feldman, 30, has been writing music since high school.

"It's the small stepping-stones, being written up the first time [in 2004], that was a big deal back then," he said.

And Feldman's come a long way.

So far, he's signed a three-song deal with Orange Lounge/InDiscover Recordings, and also signed deals with Experience Music Group and Triple Scoop Music. Recently his song, Cabin, off his second album,.was in the TV show The Ghost Whisperer.

Over the years, Feldman's learned to understand the business aspect of the music industry.

"Unfortunately, you're in a business where you're trying to sell yourself. A part of me hates that, but you learn how to [do it]," he said.

"I've always sold myself by being a genuine person. People gravitate towards honesty."

When writing songs, Feldman's usually thinking about both himself and his audience.

"It's 50/50. You find a concept that's universal and you make it your own," he said.

"I saw an interview with Jeffrey Steele, a famous songwriter. He always said, 'Just listen to what other people are saying. Look into someone's eyes and say what they're feeling.' And I think that's an incredible way to look at it. You can create from within, but to some extent, you're finding the issues at the core of who others are."

When creating a song, Feldman usually starts with a lyrical idea.

"It's humming around [singing] gibberish... and you formulate an idea based on phonetics," he said. "I find the best songs are the ones that just come out... when you write a song that you connect to, it gives you goosebumps."

This happened during a rainy day in Jamaica, when Feldman wrote Blue Skies, a song about seeing the positive in a bad situation. It was especially popular during the March of the Living, after participants had toured death camps.

"We'd be in Birkenau and everyone would be down, then someone would sing Blue Skies," he said.

Apart from performing, Feldman also teaches. He runs a division of Stay at Home Music, a company that has some 40 to 50 teachers.

"I hire teachers in addition to teaching 30 students myself," Feldman said.

While he enjoys teaching, the musician sees bigger things in his future.

"I'm still nowhere near where I want to be," he said.

But he knows how to get there.

"It's just learning how to be professional and handling yourself in a professional manner. Some would say it's unartistic, and maybe it is, but it's such a dense industry," he said. "Most [people] who make it are those who have an incredible work ethic."

Young Israeli musicians perform at Beth Torah

By RENA GODFREY
Special to The CJN

A trio of young Israeli musicians will perform Beethoven and a medley of Israeli songs in a series of private and public concerts presented by the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada in Toronto and Montreal next month.

The group, the Fresh Faces of Jerusalem, is made up of Tamar Greenstein, Uriah Tutter and Elisha Zak-Krawets, all 16, who began their musical careers at age six, at the Jerusalem Conservatory Hassadna. The conservatory is attended by 550 children who are from three to 18 years old.

Thanks to scholarship funds set up by the conservatory, all three members of the Fresh Faces participate in master classes with leading musicians. They play regularly with the conservatory's chamber orchestra and the Young Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra. They are also members of a chamber music group for outstanding musicians at the Jerusalem Music Centre, and they participate in festivals throughout Israel.

In addition to practising up to four hours after a day at high school, Greenstein, Tutter and Zak-Krawets give back to their musical community by volunteering as mentors in the From Risk to Opportunity program. Funded by the Jerusalem Foundation, this program provides access to first-rate music instruction for disadvantaged children.

Greenstein mentors Julian, a nine-year-old violin student who comes from a home where there is ongoing physical abuse between the parents. Greenstein is sensitive to Julian's situation and appreciative of her own supportive family.

"I am very lucky to have been born into a musical family," Greenstein said. "My passion is chamber music, and I hope I will become a very good chamber player." She is especially excited about performing in Canada for the first time.

Tutter, a cellist, performed a world première of a well-known Israeli composition at the Israeli Contemporary Music Festival. His siblings also attend the conservatory.

Tutter and his sister, Halel, who studies violin, practise with their brother, Yotam, who suffers from cerebral palsy and can only play piano with one finger. Despite Yotam's disability, he has an amazing musical ear and is able to feel the music just as well as all the other students at the conservatory do. The Tutter family have formed a unique musical ensemble. Playing together is one of the few activities that the Tutters can do together.

Pictured, from left, are Tamar Greenstein on violin, Elisha Zak- Krawets on piano, and Uriah Tutter on cello.

Zak-Krawets, the pianist of Fresh Faces, studies composition in a program at the conservatory and is working to become a composer. He was chosen to compose a symphony for the Israeli Contemporary Music Festival 2010. His symphony will be recorded live for Israeli radio.

Patient and kind, Zak-Krawets also plays a four-hand piano ensemble with Jacob, a nine-year-old blind boy who comes from a financially disadvantaged home. For Zak-Krawets, playing with Jacob is a powerful and meaningful experience.

Lena Nemirovksy-Wiskind, director of the Jerusalem Conservatory Hassadna since 1994, created the From Risk to Opportunity program at the conservatory. "For children from at-risk families, their studies at the conservatory brings them pride and a feeling that we believe in them," she said. "We also see the amazing power that music plays in the lives of children with special needs.

"With the very talented students who decide to take their studies to a professional level, we feel great joy in helping them receive outstanding professional guidance so that they can fulfil their dreams."

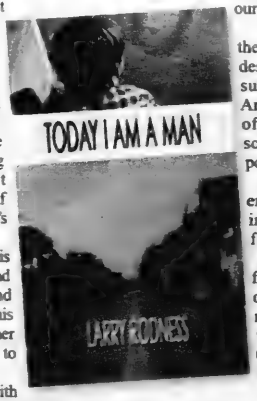
Under the direction of Prof. Michael Gaisler, the Fresh Faces perform at Beth Torah Congregation in conjunction with the Israel Aliyah Centre, on June 6.

For more information on the Fresh Faces of Jerusalem, call the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada, Toronto office, at 416-635-5491.

Musician's first book is '80 per cent biographical'

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Larry Rodness' first book, Today I Am A Man (Savant Books), opens with an uncomfortable scene: a man in his 50s beating up on a teenager outside a high school to avenge his son.



After reading the book's explosive opening chapter, you start to get glimpses into the psyche of Steven Goldman, the book's protagonist.

He's a man haunted by his past; a victim of bullying and abuse – both physical and mental – by the designs of his peers, and he's a loving father and husband trying to come to terms with his demons.

In a recent interview with The CJN, Rodness explained that though the characters are fictional, the story is really "80 per cent biographical" and that the Goldman character is based on his own experiences as a youth.

In the book, Goldman recounts how his family moved from Toronto to Los Angeles for three years at the behest of his father in order to try to live the American dream.

Rodness' family did the same thing in 1963.

"My family thought we were going to the land of opportunity," Rodness said. Instead, his family eked out a meagre living before finally returning to Toronto "defeated, with our tails between our legs."

In the book, young Goldman, the transplanted high schooler describes trying to fit into the surfer culture of 1960s Los Angeles. He befriends a gang of delinquent youths in high school to become one of the popular boys.

In the process, he discovers a love of music and more importantly, his own moral fibre.

Goldman's newfound friends turn out to have their own agendas and revel at misleading and tormenting the naive Jewish kid from Canada, getting him into trouble as often as they can.

His one solace is the love of a girl who lives next door, who supports him through each new crisis of faith and friendship.

Rodness, a Toronto musician, said he originally wrote the story as a screenplay and has been shopping it around to gauge interest from filmmakers.

"One of the life lessons I learned [while living in L.A. as a youth] was how to deal with a bully," he said, adding that readers of his book will find it's all about "sexual awakenings, learning respect for women… [and] realizing that if you're fortunate in life, you find the right person to grow with."

He said he let family members read the manuscript before publishing it and that he was happy they were all "OK with it."

The title comes from the often uttered phrase used by bar mitzvah boys in their thank-you speeches.

"Every kid says, 'Today I am a man,' but not every kid understands what this means as a bar mitzvah," Rodness said, adding that his experiences at that age taught him that one doesn't get something for nothing, and that you shouldn't always look for the "easy way" in life.

Larry Rodness

He said that every child experiences some type of bullying in their formative years, parents need to face this fact and not run from it. It's a lesson he hopes readers will take away from the book.

Film explores same-sex marriage with humour

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When Nelson Hirsch, a young and handsome Jewish bachelor, informs his parents that there is a significant other in his life, they seem pleased. Yet the prospect that their beloved son will marry a nice Jewish girl seems too good to be true.

In Evgeny Afineevsky's comedy, Oy Vey! My Son Is Gay! – which is due to be screened at the Inside Out film festival on Sunday, May 23 at 7 p.m. at the Isabel Bader Theatre – the realities and norms of our fast-changing modern society are on full display.

Exploring the contemporary issue of same-sex marriage with humour and empathy, it comes down on the side of our common humanity.

When Shirley (Lainie Kazan), Nelson's brassy mother, learns that Nelson is ending his bachelorhood, there is only one question on her mind. "Is she Jewish?" Her assumption harkens back to an earlier era.

Her husband, Martin (Saul Rubinek), is hardly as impulsive. "Don't call the rabbi," he advises. Does Martin know more than he lets on?

Eager to sort things out, Shirley stops by Nelson's apartment, where she is greeted by Angelo (Jai Rodriguez), Nelson's Italian-American partner, who passes himself off as his interior decorator. In short order, Shirley also meets her son's gorgeous neighbour, Sybil Williams (Carmen Electra), a magazine cover girl whom she assumes is Nelson's fiancé.

Lainie Kazan and John Lloyd Young in Oy Vey! My Son Is Gay!

In exasperation, Nelson (John Lloyd Young) struggles to tell his mom that he's gay. But Shirley is so self-absorbed by her idle chatter that his disclosure goes over her head. Finally, Nelson manages to break the news to her. Shirley, turning to Martin, intones indeadpan fashion, "Your son is a homosexual."

Despite her initial reaction, Shirley finally accepts her son's sexual preference. Martin, however, is a holdout. Angelo's parents seem more understanding.

This predictable film with the usual stock characters is only sporadically funny. More too often than not, it is droningly boring. It's clear that several non-essential scenes could easily have been consigned to the cutting floor.

The performances are middling to good. Kazan, the central character, is a force of nature, but she's way over the top. Rubinek is considerably more measured. Young and Rodriguez acquit themselves reasonably well. Electra is quite a dish, especially in the bathtub.

Oy Vey! My Son is Gay! might have been a better film had there been a decent script and had Kazan been able to control her emotions.

All in all, it falls considerably short of the mark.

Ajami is a rough and tumble Israeli film

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ajami, Israel's entry for best foreign movie at this year's Academy Awards, is gritty to its core.

Set mainly in Jaffa and fleetingly in the West Bank town of Nablus, Ajami opens in Toronto on May 28.

Co-directed by Yaron Shani, an Israeli Jew, and Scandar Copti, an Israeli Arab, it unfolds in chapters against the unsettling backdrop of a drive-by shooting, an expected reprisal and the disappearance of an Israeli soldier in the West Bank.

The mistaken murder of a young Arab man in Jaffa as he repairs his car on the street touches off the chain reaction of retaliatory killings and subsequent attempts to reach a workable truce through the payment of hard, cold cash.

This segment is in Arabic, with English subtitles. It's narrated by Nasri (Fouad Habash), a 13-year-old who keeps a detailed diary of events.

He and his older brother, Omar (Shahir Kebabha), try to protect themselves and their family by turning to a local fixer and elder, Abua Elias (Youssef Sahwani). They hope he can defuse a tense situation that is spinning dangerously out of control.

"Money is the only solution," says Elias, putting his finger on the pulse of the problem.

About 40 minutes into the film, Hebrew kicks in as Dando (Eran Naim), a Tel Aviv detective assigned to the drug squad, starts looking for his missing brother, the soldier.

Amid the ensuing drama and grief, Dando's wife complains that he works too hard and is an absent husband.

Dando's quest to find his brother dovetails with a chapter revolving around Binj (Copti), a hardened Arab drug dealer who's dating a Jewish woman.

Binj's Arab friends do not appreciate his relationship with her. But the schism between Jews and Arabs in Israel transcends Binj and his Jewish girlfriend. It also emerges when an Arab man suggests that the Arab sector does not receive its fair share of government funds and when a Jew compares Jaffa, with its growing Arab minority, to the Gaza Strip.

Ajami moves slowly and even aimlessly at times, belying its explosive content.

The actors, all amateurs recruited and trained by the directors in workshops over the course of almost a year, do not strain for effect. They react to various situations in naturalistic fashion.

Ajami, which sometimes has the feel of a graphic documentary, deftly explores themes such as family ties and Arab-Jewish inter-communal tensions.

Israel, in this rough and tumble film, is a seething cauldron of crime, vengeance and misspent lives.

Tragedy permeates Ajami.

The Winterhouse is a real winner

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

If truth were told, not all past winners of the fiction prize in the annual Helen & Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards have been outstanding reads. Once in a rare while, a winner has been selected merely because it was the best of a bad lot and pickings were slim that year.

Fortunately, that's not the case with The Winterhouse, the novel by Newfoundland writer Robin McGrath that has been named the winner of this year's fiction prize, to be awarded at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre on May 27.

The Winterhouse (Killick Press) is a lovely book, full of memorable characters, sharp writing and plenty of history, folklore and rustic charm. It is mostly set in a rugged and scarcely populated island in the British colony of Newfoundland in the fall and winter of 1820.

The story revolves around two characters: Rosehannah, a strong-willed and independent 14-year-old daughter who is left to fend for herself after her mother dies, and her father moves away to cohabit with a widow; and Jacob Harris, a travelling Jewish sales agent who is shipwrecked upon his arrival from England and stays for the winter.

As the story begins, the father sells his store to the newcomer, who, much weakened from his ordeal, hardly notices as the man includes Rosehannah in the deal. The father hastily marries Rosehannah to the stranger so he can depart with a freer conscience now that his only child (step-child, actually) has a husband to care for her.

The subtleties of the developing relationship between the wise and capable Rosehannah and the quiet and gentle "mister" take a back seat to the demands that survival imposes upon them in their isolated fishing village along the ocean coast and the inland "winterhouse" where they retreat to better endure the winter.

McGrath commands an awesome knowledge of fishing and boating, plants and berries of the woods, how to skin and roast a variety of wild and domestic birds, and such diverse skills as snowshoeing, crafting metal objects in a home-made forge, and salting fish and game. To all of this, she adds a dollop of humanity as she paints the various families on the island who live in a necessary symbiosis with one another. Sociability, neighbourliness and tolerance are not just expected; they are mandatory.

All in all, it seems an astonishingly authentic portrait of a rustic community, comparable, say, to A. J. Cronin's Welsh village in The Citadel, except much more rudimentary. The Winterhouse is made all the more lovelier by McGrath's language, which is salted with delicious old words and aphorisms.

The novel features, as an epistolary subplot, a modern correspondence between some genealogical researchers who are delving into the Harris family tree and into the history of the Jews on the Newfoundland "Rock." Through this expeditious device McGrath is able to introduce much fascinating material.

The Winterhouse is an impressive book that will appeal to patient readers willing to take the time to let a good book win them over.

There Is No Other by Jonathan Papernick

In There Is No Other (Exile Editions), a collection of compelling stories by former Torontonian Jonathan Papernick (now of Boston), we meet a caretaker who has a vision of the Virgin Mary in a Reform temple in Boston; an angry Jewish kid who comes to a school Purim party wearing a Mohammed costume and a suicide-bomber apparatus; and an American Jewish businessman who wants to build baseball stadiums in Israel and the Palestinian territories in the hope that the game will bring on peace.

Like a speeding curveball, most of these stories have an ironic twist that spins them in an unpredictable direction. Papernick (unlike Robin McGrath) writes about Jewish tradition from the inside, with an insider's comprehension of its quirks and contradictions, in a prose style tinged with dark humour and irreverence.

Comparisons have aptly been made with Nathan Englander and Bernard Malamud. Papernick is in the same ballpark, but at this stage he's still hitting mostly singles and doubles, with not enough home runs to make it into the majors.

My favourite story is The Madonna of Temple Beth Elohim, which presents us with the hilarious conundrum of a rabbi who cannot keep the crowds out of his synagogue after word gets out that someone has seen the Virgin Mary in a piece of wood on the altar.

That rich irony is counterbalanced by the sense of discomfort generated in There Is No Other, when the kid in the suicide costume achieves his Columbine ambition. Papernick is nothing if not a literary iconoclast keen on exploding our idols, ideals and conceptions about ourselves and others.

Not all of the stories have Jewish characters. In What Is It Then, Between Us? a husband runs momentarily down the block to find a handyman to fix the radiator and ends up in a bar and, ultimately, a full-blown sexual liaison. Then he rushes home to find his wife, for once, "in the mood."

The two worlds meet in Skin for Skin, when a non-Jewish boy forces himself upon a Jewish girl from the same high school. She is shocked, first by the crucifix dangling from his neck, then by another appendage – which she seeks to improve with a Japanese paring knife.

At times erotic as well as neurotic, and infused with a dark and sometimes-funny magic realism, many of these stories feature an array of semi-crazed, lonely people living on the precarious edge between reality, Jewish tradition, and their dreams.

Hockey tournament a win for Alzheimer's research

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

The Gordie and Colleen Howe Fund for Baycrest scored $3.6 million for Alzheimer's research at its annual Scotiabank Pro Am for Alzheimer's hockey tournament in Toronto and Edmonton earlier this month.

"It combines people's passion and love of the game of hockey with fundraising for a fantastic organization and cause," Ruth Morayniss, director of marketing and donor communications for the Baycrest Foundation, said of the tourney.

This is its fifth year in Toronto and the first in Edmonton, where participants raised $2.6 million and $1 million respectively, she said, adding that the event has grown every year. Five years ago, the Toronto tournament had 24 teams. This year it had 50.

There are discussions about bringing the tournament to Calgary and Montreal next year, and there are talks about expanding to more cities across the country, as well as a few in the United States, said Mark Gryfe, president of the Baycrest Foundation.

Since the first year, the foundation has raised more than $10 million for the Gordie and Colleen Howe Fund for Alzheimer's research, Morayniss said.

Teams that raised the most money had first pick of the ex-pros and Olympic stars in the draft.

Top fundraisers play with NHL alumni

It's all about the experience and the fundraising, Gryfe said, explaining that when players drafted the hockey stars, they got to spend the weekend with them.

Many NHL alumni played in the tournament, including former Montreal Canadiens greats Guy Lafleur and Mark Napier, as well as former Calgary Flame and Toronto Maple Leaf Doug Gilmour. There were also three women from Canada's 2002 and 2006 gold medal Olympic hockey teams.

The top team this year was called the Geri Hat-Tricks, which picked former Toronto Maple Leafs defenceman Borje Salming first.

The top 20 individual fundraisers also had the opportunity to play in an all-star game with 20 NHL alumni.

Napier said he has been involved in the tournament since the beginning. He said the former professionals love to participate either through playing, signing autographs or refereeing, and this year, there was a waiting list.

"It's the best event I've ever been involved in," said Gryfe, who has been fundraising for about 30 years and was recently given the Gordy Wolfe Award for Jewish communal professional leadership.

The event began years ago as a golf tournament, he explained. "That turned into a discussion of hockey, and as soon as we said it, we knew it was a winner."

Shane Altbaum, an MBA student at the University of Toronto, said it was surreal to play hockey with his childhood heroes.

"As I stepped into my first face-off against Doug Gilmour, I leaned in and said to him 'I've been dreaming about this for 15 years.' He smiled and beat me cleanly."

The event had a special significance to Altbaum beyond playing with the hockey stars. As a child, he said, he would watch hockey with his grandfather every night, but eventually his grandfather was diagnosed with Alzheimer's.

Napier also has a connection to the disease. Five years ago, after he had already been involved with the tournament, a family doctor diagnosed his father-in-law with Alzheimer's.

Even after taking medication, there was little improvement, he said. His father-in-law went to Baycrest for an evaluation, where they discovered his disease to be a different form of dementia.

He didn't know much about Baycrest before this happened, he said, but soon discovered that it's one of the best facilities of its kind not only in Canada, but in the world.

Participants in the tournament raised varying amounts. Harry Lebovic raked in more than $100,000, winning the Gordie Howe Award as top fundraiser.

Altbaum, who participated this year for the first time, said he raised about $4,000, and looks forward to taking part in coming years.

He said the experience was indescribable.

"You're walking through the arena playing with your heroes," he said. "It's something I'll talk about for the rest of my life."

Internet medical info can mislead

By MICHAEL GORDON

"I'm just not sure I want to try this on my mother," the daughter said as we discussed starting her mother on a medication used to treat people suffering from dementia.

I had seen her mother twice. The first evaluation came up with a provisional diagnosis of moderate dementia. The second one followed some investigations and a chance for the daughter and her husband to consider my medication recommendation.

The Senior Side of Life

Six months had passed and the mother was still manifesting the same symptoms, which included some cognitive deficiencies as well as a flattening of her mood, a symptom often seen in individuals who suffer from Alzheimer's disease and other dementias. Meanwhile, the well-educated daughter perused all the information she could find on the Internet and became overwhelmed by all the blogs about medication side effects and could not make the treatment decision. "I have been afraid to fill the prescription," she said.

I reiterated my views on trying the medication, which although not curative often improves cognition, interactive and social abilities, and likely decreases the rate of further decline. I then asked her about her view of risk. "I am just afraid to take any chances," she said.

I asked her how she got her mother to my office that day. She answered, "By car, via Highway 400 and then the 401."

I looked at her and said, "Now that is really risky. With a drug, most of the time if there is a problem, when you stop the drug, the problem goes away. When you drive and there is a problem – it can be fatal."

Three months later, the daughter visited with her mother and was elated. "I cannot tell you how much better she is," she told me.

When I asked her to explain, she replied, "She is just there. She is engaged and responsive, even though her memory is probably not much better, but she now communicates and even has some of her humour back. It is really something."

Many family members come to my office now with newspaper articles and, more and more lately, information from the Internet. They want to know if I know something about what is printed, which, of course, is not always so. They ask why there are so many conflicting reports and are often paralyzed in decision making.

Some of the disease-specific blogs have only the bad outcomes, which is why people blog about them. Rarely do people who have had good results take the trouble to write about them.

I try to explain to my patients and their families that data, the raw material from studies, has yet to be incorporated and tested. After that, it might be called "information." The problem is that information is fluid and may change from one study to another, depending on the nature of the study. Only after it has been consistently verified can it become what we would generally call "knowledge," meaning that it is consistent and likely reproduced by many investigators and observers.

The key to quality medical practice is how the "knowledge" is used in the context of an individual patient, and such complex decision-making becomes the wisdom of the profession and of the physician. That's why a physician's medical experience, using all the available tools and observations, matters so much.

Getting information from various sources may be helpful. But it is the discussion with your physician, whom presumably you trust, that should finalize why you accept and make important medical decisions.

Dr. Michael Gordon is medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest and co-author with Bart Mindszenthy of Parenting Your Parents (Dundurn Press). His latest book, Brooklyn Beginnings: A Geriatrician's Odyssey, can be researched from his website: http://www.drmichaelgordon.com.

MASHED SWEET POTATOES W BANANA & BROWN SUGAR

8 lg. sweet potatoes
3 tbls kosher salt
1 banana, 2" slit cut into peel
8 tbls unsalted butter
2 c milk
1 cinnamon stick crushed
1/4 c light brown sugar
1 tsp ground black pepper

Wash potatoes well, poke holes into them, rub each with about 1 tsp salt, wrap with heavy-duty aluminum foil. Place directly on oven rack at 350°F for about 50 min., or until tender, then scoop out into ovenproof bowl and cover. At same time, bake banana in peel on rack until blackened, about 15 min. and scoop out into separate bowl. While potatoes are still warm (you may have to reheat in oven a minute or two), add butter and let melt. Add milk, cinnamon, brown sugar, baked banana, 1 tsp salt, 1 tsp pepper. Using a potato masher, combine. Season to taste with additional salt and pepper as needed. Reheat when ready to use.

The key to weight loss

What is the key to successful weight loss?

I get asked this question a lot, and I actually do have a simple answer. The key to successful weight loss is having your head in the right place to do it! So many people come to my office saying they want to lose weight, and they know they have to, and they really believe that they want to be thinner and healthier. The problem is, they are not willing to put in the work required to lose weight; they still would rather have the instant gratification of eating what they want.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

On the flip side, when a client comes in who is motivated, determined and committed, it turns out to be an easy goal to achieve, because through the process, the client does not feel punished or deprived and naturally make the right choices because it is what he or she really wants. If you want to be thinner and healthier, more than you want to eat that tempting food in front of you, you actually no longer want those tempting foods because they would put you further away from your goal.

Sorry to say it, ladies, but men are often very good at putting their mind to this task and to being very motivated. Men also generally have an easier time losing weight for physiologic reasons, and they tend to be less emotional eaters than us.

Your attitude is truly one essential key to successful weight loss and in keeping it off afterward, an equally challenging task. If you are going to start dieting and each day or week make an excuse for why you weren't successful, then maybe you need to ask yourself if you are really ready.

Remember my advice from a previous column, if you find you cannot yet set your mind to successfully losing weight, then at the very least, stop gaining!

A sick chicken, or to be a Jew

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

There's something particular about being Jewish.

We celebrate things that no other people celebrate, such as the fact hockey is played in Metulla, Israel, and nowhere else in the Middle East. Being Jewish means we are exclusively proud of daf yomi – a daily regimen of studying one page of Talmud a day, for 7-1/2 years, until all tractates are completed.

URBAN WRITER

We rejoice about the fact that more than 22 per cent of those who have received the Nobel Peace Prize are Jewish or of Jewish descent. We are excited that Jews were dominant in the clothing industry, and that about 25 per cent of the people on Forbes Fortune 500 list are Jews.

Being Jewish means we have contributed and cheered while valiant and plucky Israeli and Diaspora Jews – our home team – flew on the wings of eagles, saving Jews from Yemen, Ethiopia, Uganda, Odessa and the Baltic.

To be Jewish is to be a member of a clan with a voracious appetite for curiosity, compassion, and the intent of self-development and the enhancement of our existence and world.

Of course, we Jews have our foibles, and we have our migraines.

Being Jewish means that when we see someone with a gold tooth, we think of the Holocaust, when our family's teeth were painfully and hatefully extracted. Our memories, because we are Jews, are littered with sinister and serrated images from every century.

Being Jewish means that when your little boy – say one who is four years old – is pretending to be a monster and tries to scare an older woman sitting on a bench in front of your condo, she responds, "You can't scare me, zees'ala [sweetheart], I was in the Holocaust."

Being Jewish means that (as funny as it may seem being parodied) 10 Jews around the table really does make for 11 opinions (if we're lucky) and causes great ethical and practical bottlenecks. (An example: should the unearmarked donation be used to buy more prayer books or redesign the cloakroom? Another example: should we build settlements in the territories?)

Being Jewish, or more so, being "chassidishe," means it's difficult to be seen on Friday night while walking home from shul on a side street. A bekishe, a man's silken black cloak, does not reflect light and, therefore, puts the wearer in danger. (Perhaps our many entrepreneurs in the clothing industry should design a luminous bekishe strip).

One morning my boy said Modeh Ani (the prayer thanking God for returning his spirit) by heart. He had heard me all those months. That instance was important, because I worry if I am imparting enough to him about Judaism. I glimpsed a success. Being Jewish at that moment meant my son was expressing appreciation, identifying with creation and the Creator, and stating his place in the world.

Being Jewish at that second was also troublesome, as it meant my son is a Jew and is committing to being so, and what parent of our faith doesn't worry about our safety as a people, and particularly about the safety of our children?

Henny Youngman joked: a Jewish woman had two chickens. One got sick, so the woman made chicken soup out of the other one, to help the sick one get well.

That's the challenge and conundrum of being Jewish. We celebrate our chickens and then they always get sick. We care, sometimes to our detriment. Some Jews are wise, and – as Mark Twain said about people in general – "some are otherwise."

I have such a headache now, but I'm so proud. I'm going to bed. Good night.

Many Faces... One Community

A salute to our community and its volunteers

UJA FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO

Across the street. Across the globe.

Volunteerism is alive and thriving

There is no better indication of the health of a community then how many of its members are committed, able and willing to volunteer their time. Jewish Toronto was built on a strong tradition of volunteerism, of individuals giving of themselves to improve the lives of others, and we are both so proud today in knowing that tradition is alive and thriving.

We should never take for granted the thousands of volunteers whose passion for Jewish life and vision for a bright future have moved them to come out to telethons, the Walk with Israel, rallies and events. We are truly one of the most fortunate communities in the world.

As we venture forward in our new positions as the Chairs of United Jewish Appeal's Campaign 2011, we are inspired by the work of everyone who has ever offered their time, their energy and dedication to community life and we are grateful for their commitment.

We look forward to the Campaign ahead and the momentum of our volunteers who will propel us forward with hope and enthusiasm for what is yet to come.

Sincerely,

Sherry Firestone Jeff Rosenthal

As the Jewish community continues to grow across the Greater Toronto Area, so, too, does the importance of our committed, passionate and knowledgeable volunteers.
Whether it's those who give of themselves to raise money at our annual UJA telethons, or the hundreds who spend their free time making UJA's Walk with Israel so successful year after year, the importance of volunteers simply cannot be overstated. They are truly the engine that drives our remarkable community, volunteering their valuable time and talents to UJA and our array of partner agencies, all of whom perform vital work to enhance our community.
As the great Jewish thinker, Rashi, said, "Naked a man comes into the world and naked he leaves it, after all his toil, he carries away nothing, except the deeds he leaves behind." This Volunteer Recognition Supplement is our way of acknowledging you for your ongoing commitment to tikkun olam, repairing the world; a mitzvah that each of you performs by giving your most valuable asset – yourself.
Thank you!

Sustaining our people and our tradition

We travel the journey from Pesach to Shavuot every year. Freedom is not an end in itself in our tradition. Our people were released from bondage so that we might make a commitment to the Holy One. During the Omer period, these seven weeks, we are commanded to count our blessings. We recall that our people gave of their time and talent to create the "Mishkan," the symbol of holiness in an ancient wilderness.

The structures that house our communal life are much more permanent in our world today. We are sustained by the on-going contribution of volunteers, regardless of the physical premises in which they make their mark. Just as we count our days and our blessings, we acknowledge that giving of our time allows our community to thrive. Every volunteer is deserving of recognition.

Each of us who does our part helps to build and sustain our people and our tradition. These many seemingly small acts of caring and commitment make our communal life possible. Experience tells us that our true beliefs are those that we chose to act upon. Our tradition is based on covenantal responsibility. We each must make our mark.

However, we can do even more. We are taught (Talmud Bavli Y'vamot 20a), קדש עצמך במותר לך Create holiness by going beyond obligation. The volunteers, who show what each of us is capable of, set holy examples. When we tell their stories, we do more than acknowledge their contribution. We raise the bar for each of us to step forward and make a difference. May their work challenge us to work for the betterment of our people in our local community, in Israel, and around the world.

Volunteer puts life on hold for Haiti earthquake victims

By Dan Horowitz

While billions of people around the world watched the horrific images of the January 12, 2010 earthquake that struck Haiti, for some, watching was simply not good enough.

Eilat resident Roy Rosenfeld, a 31-year-old businessman and former paramedic with Magen David Adom - Israel's national disaster, ambulance and blood bank service - volunteered his services to the people of Haiti as part of IsraAID: The Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid.

IsraAID is a coordinating body of Israeli and Jewish NGOs in Israel that provides humanitarian aid worldwide. United Jewish Appeal has previously supported its work following earthquakes in Peru and Pakistan, on the border of Darfur, and after Hurricane Katrina and the recent typhoon in the Philippines.

Just six days after the quake devastated Haiti and ultimately killed more than 230,000, while leaving over a million homeless, Rosenfeld landed in Port-au-Prince as part of IsraAID's second rescue team deployed to the region.

"No matter how much we were prepared for this mission, you really couldn't be ready to witness the amount of devastation, death, pain and suffering that awaited us," explained Rosenfeld in a phone interview. "We were looking down at the devastation on the ground as our small plane landed. It was an amazing scene with airplanes, helicopters, aircraft carriers and other military crafts filling every square inch of the field below us. What I remember the most was that on these aircraft were flags from all over the world. The whole world came to help these poor people. From up in the air, seeing these victims everywhere, it looked like a whole country was homeless."

Of all the tragic victims of Haiti, one young woman, in particular, touched Rosenfeld's heart, becoming a personal project for the Israeli.

"On our second day on the ground, I came across a young girl, around 18, named Alexandra Paul," recounted an emotional Rosenfeld. "She had been trapped under the ruins of her house for two days after the earthquake. Initially, she had been treated in a Japanese field hospital that diagnosed her with a crushed pelvis. The doctors told her that there was nothing they could do for her at that time."

But, for Rosenfeld, a self-confessed "stubborn Israeli," giving up was simply not an option.

Two days after first meeting Alexandra, Rosenfeld, along with Israeli actress turned volunteer Moran Atias, received an urgent message that a helicopter was about to land near Leogand, a small town approximately three hours from Port-au-Prince. It also sustained the majority of damage from the quake. The two of them raced to Alexandra's camp and rushed her onto a stretcher and to the landing zone.

"Unfortunately, the helicopter landed in the wrong zone," recalled Rosenfeld. "The following morning, Moran and I, accompanied by two more friends from the JP/HRO team, found a local volunteer with a pickup truck and drove to the Doctors without Borders camp in Leogand. We rigged the pickup with a mattress and stretcher, a shade canopy and an IV hanging clip. I established IV access for Alexandra so I could give her a shot of morphine if the trip was too painful." Rosenfeld sat with Alexandra in the back of the truck all the way to the airport, holding her hand for the entire three-hour drive on less than ideal roads.

At the airport, Alexandra was admitted to the MediShare Field Hospital where Rosenfeld was assured she would be evacuated the next day. As it turned out, the MediShare Hospital misplaced her records and they were never found.

"Still, I didn't stop looking for her even after I came home," said Rosenfeld. "Finally, on April 5, I tracked her down; she is back in Leogand in a camp. She had been evacuated to the USNS Comfort, the U.S. Navy medical ship where she underwent three unsuccessful surgeries and remains paralyzed from the waist down. I'm glad our efforts got her evacuated, but I wish we could have done more to get her walking again. I am currently reviewing options for getting her flown out to a medical center specializing in orthopedic surgery, specifically pelvic reconstructive surgery. We remain in touch and I hope to see her again soon."

Rosenfeld, as part of the IsraAID/Fast Israeli Rescue & Search Team (F.I.R.S.T), implemented new systems in Haiti that simply did not exist prior to their arrival. In the Petronville Refugee Camp, home to more than 100,000 victims, joining forces with the Jennings Penn Haiti Relief Organization, led on the ground by actor Sean Penn, Rosenfeld and others were split into five teams of three medical experts who performed exhausting tent-by-tent "house calls," seeing who needed attention and prioritizing their needs.

"We also set up an OBGYN tent and we built portable X-Ray and ultrasound machines from scratch for pregnant women," said Rosenfeld. "One of the late nights there, a guard came running to us screaming that a woman was about to give birth. And, just five minutes later, an 82nd Airborne medic and I – armed with only a flashlight – delivered her baby on a hill. It was amazing, but bittersweet, knowing that this baby's first night in the world would be in an improvised tent in the middle of so much destruction. But it was also something to know that, in the midst of all this death, we helped bring new life to the region." In all, Rosenfeld's team delivered six babies during his time in Haiti.

Rosenfeld's team also included a post-traumatic stress specialist who worked with Haiti's children on a daily basis, many of whom were suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder. She treated more than 500 children and set up a psycho-social study among the refugee camp's 100,000 displaced people to ascertain their needs to better coordinate the relief efforts.

"Along with our team, she also helped created two new schools in Haiti for young kids," Rosenfeld said proudly. "Knowing that we did more than watch these people suffering on television, that we actually joined all these other incredible volunteers, all of whom left the comfort and stability of their own lives for a while to do something of this magnitude is really a wonderful feeling. Although I returned to Israel on February 11, my mind and soul are still very much with the people of Haiti."

Roy Rosenfeld, along with Israeli actress turned volunteer Moran Atias, comforts Alexandra, a victim of the Haiti earthquake, in a pickup truck he rigged with a mattress, stretcher and an IV hanging clip, as they drive her to safety.

Eilat resident Roy Rosenfeld poses with some Haitian locals.

Teens practice tikkun olam

Hundreds of GTA-area teens joined Jewish teens from across North America, Europe and Israel for J Serve, the Global Day of Jewish Youth Service. Thanks to funding from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, this was the first year the teens had the opportunity to participate in the international initiative that sees them volunteer at a variety of community service and improvement projects. Pictured above, GTA teens create blankets for displaced Haitian refugees who have been devastated by the recent earthquake that rocked their country.

Preparing tomorrow's volunteers today

By Alana Getzler

Since its creation in November 2008, UJA Federation's Joshua Institute for Jewish Communal Leadership - chaired by Glennie Lindenberg and Shawna Granovsky - has made good on its mandate to better prepare, guide and educate both present and future volunteer leadership across Toronto's Jewish community.

The Institute launched its inaugural program for incoming chairs with the intention of forming a strong group of leaders who would collaborate on behalf of the community, and who would look beyond their own agencies in order to see the larger picture of communal needs and the importance of partnerships.

While the Incoming Chairs Program recently completed its first year, the Future Volunteer Leaders Program has just begun, and is focused on developing a cadre of community leaders who will be ready to assume lay leadership roles in the near future.

Partnered with the Rotman School of Business Executive Programs, the two-year Future Volunteer Leaders Program, that began in January 2010, reflects the diversity of the Jewish community. Participants are between the ages of 30 and 40, and from different backgrounds and walks of life. The cohort includes men and women who represent a range of geographical neighbourhoods, ethnic and cultural backgrounds, and religious denominations, and was gathered by a call for nominations to the community-at-large.

The group meets once a month with programs consisting of learning about UJA Federation, fundraising and philanthropy, outreach, engagement and increasing affiliation, Toronto's role in Israel and Jewish values – all underlying the importance of volunteering and tikkun olam – repairing the world.

The strengths and interests of the individuals are assessed throughout their participation and, in order to best utilize the skills honed in the Future Volunteer Leaders Program, participants are ultimately placed in volunteer positions at UJA Federation, its partner agencies and schools that are best suited for each participant's abilities.

"As participants progress through this program, and we learn where their passions lie, we are helping them find committee placements that resonate with them, and where they can make a real contribution to Jewish Toronto," said Zeeva Millman, Director of the Joshua Institute. "Only four months into the program, one member has joined a newly-created fiscal committee, two others are on the PJ Library committee, and another has been connected to a funded agency that needed expertise that this future volunteer leader can provide."

Participants in the UJA Federation Joshua Institute for Jewish Communal Leadership's Future Volunteer Leaders Program meet in the Lipa Green Centre.

Future of Jewish Toronto in good hands

It's been said that youth is wasted on the young. But, for a group of compassionate, generous and enthusiastic Toronto teenagers, that adage couldn't be more wrong.

The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto's B'nai Tzedek Teen Philanthropy initiative is an innovative program introducing Bar/Bat Mitzvah-aged teens to the nachas and rewards of tzedakah by establishing an endowment fund in their own name. Participants can designate a portion of their gift to a specific philanthropic project, learning about needs in Toronto and in Israel through discussions with staff at the Jewish Foundation.

Ariel Segal

Dani Palter

This year, for the first time, the prestigious Shem Tov Leadership Award is being presented to teens involved with B'nai Tzedek, Dani Palter and Ariel Segal, both of whom, despite their youth, personify tikkun olam – repairing the world. Dani has always had a strong desire to help others. In recent years, the Grade 11 TanenbaumCHAT student has dedicated a significant amount of time to community service. Whether building a house for Habitat for Humanity or bowling with children from Zareinu, Dani is committed to improving the lives of others. "I enjoy giving back to the community because I like knowing that I am making a difference in the world, however big or small it may be," says Dani.

In lieu of Bat Mitzvah gifts, Dani, through the Jewish Foundation, recently raised funds to build a playground in a low-income area in Acco, Israel.

Ariel, a Grade 12 TanenbaumCHAT student, will be spending a year in Israel on the Nativ Program, a challenging academic year dedicated to creating and inspiring the Jewish leaders of tomorrow, before returning to Canada to attend Queen's University. She is actively involved in the Beit Haminyan youth service. Ariel received the Student Canvasser Award from United Jewish Appeal for both the 2009 and 2010 annual campaigns. As a B'nai Tzedek participant, Ariel has opened a fund from which she donates to causes that are especially meaningful to her. "Teenagers have lots of options for how they spend their free time," explains Ariel. "Giving back to the community is an important value that I was raised with, and helping others helps me better appreciate what I have."

Volunteer Excellence: The Community Honours Its Own

The men and women on pages B5-B7 have made tzedakah and community involvement constant priorities in their lives. Their unrelenting commitment to Jewish values helps enrich the lives of so many. They received their awards on May 17 at UJA Federation's Awards Night.

BEN SADOWSKI AWARD OF MERIT

UJA Federation created this award in 1960, the single most prestigious acknowledgement the Jewish community bestows upon a volunteer with outstanding leadership qualities and years of involvement in the Jewish and general communities. With his unwavering commitment to people, Ben Sadowski z"l, the first President of the United Jewish Welfare Fund (predecessor to UJA Federation), embodied the definition of a natural leader. This award is his legacy to the Jewish community.

WENDY EISEN

A passionate and selfless community leader, Wendy has demonstrated a strong personal commitment to the welfare of the Jewish people throughout her adult life.

Her involvement began as a young bride, assuming leadership roles in the Women's Division of Montreal's CJA campaign. After moving to Toronto in 1981, Wendy took on several leadership positions, including chairing various divisions of UJA Women's Campaign and UJA Top Gifts. In 1995, she co-chaired UJA's Annual Campaign.

For more than a decade, from the mid-1970s, Wendy was a passionate activist in the struggle to liberate the "Jews of Silence," repressed in the Soviet Union. She chaired both the Montreal and Toronto Group of 35 - Women's Campaign for Soviet Jewry and the Soviet Jewry Committee of Canadian Jewish Congress. With her extraordinary leadership skills and tenacity, rallies and demonstrations kept the plight of Soviet Jewry in the public eye, relentlessly pressing the Soviets to "Let our people go!" After the Iron Curtain parted in 1991, Wendy chronicled the efforts of the Canadian Soviet Jewry campaign, culminating in the 1995 publication of her book, Count Us In — the Struggle to Free Soviet Jews.

Wendy has led UIA Missions to Eastern Europe, the Soviet Union, Argentina and Israel and has served on the Boards of UJA Federation, Canadian Jewish Congress, State of Israel Bonds and the United Way. She was the founding Chair of the Holy Blossom Temple Foundation and currently is the National Co-Chair of the Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum.

"Communal leadership has enriched my life immeasurably. I have developed skills, shared extraordinary experiences and formed life-long friendships. I truly believe that I have received much more than I have given."

Past Chairs Lederman Award

This award, named for Harold Lederman z"l, is presented to an outstanding philanthropic leader and volunteer who is also a past Chair of the United Jewish Appeal Annual Campaign. Lederman, driven by a keen social conscience and strong support for Jewish communal life, believed in the importance of continuity. His message to future generations was to be responsible, a legacy of a real philanthropic leader.

TODDY AND IRVING GRANOVSKY

Year after year, Toddy and Irving raise the bar when it comes to volunteerism and leadership within Toronto's Jewish community and the community-at-large.

With over four decades of philanthropic leadership, they embody the ideals of the word "tzedakah." They have always given selflessly and generously to every and all endeavours created to improve the lives of Jews in Toronto, Israel and around the world. A couple who has never sought personal tributes, and whose community participation and giving have always been the result of a deep, personal commitment to Jewish values and the State of Israel, they are grateful that their five children and their spouses all share their passion for Jewish philanthropy and Israel.

"One of the main tenets of our Jewish religion is to do tzedakah according to the gifts G-d has given. We feel very blessed to be able to give and actively participate with our children and grandchildren in our great community, country and in Israel."

Phil Granovsky Award for Campaign Excellence

This award honours individuals who exemplify the best in United Jewish Appeal campaigning. When it came to the welfare of world Jewry, few were more committed than Phil Granovsky z"l, who saw Israel and the Diaspora as an extension of his family. Granovsky's selfless legacy continues to help countless people in the community every single year.

BRUCE LEBOFF

Bruce, whose commitment to Jewish Toronto and Israel is evident in everything he does, embodies many of the same qualities of the late Phil Granovsky. A UJA Federation Leadership Development Award recipient in 1999, Bruce has continued to establish himself as a prominent community leader.

He is a member of the UJA Campaign Executive Cabinet for the fourth consecutive year, and is now in his second year as Top Gifts Co-Chair. Bruce was also a founding Co-Chair of the Campaign's Bay Street Cabinet. He regularly attends telethons with his three children and, together with his wife, Lianne, is chairing the annual Walk with Israel for the second year - an event which attracts thousands in support of Israel. Bruce also sits on the UJA Business and Finance Committee and serves on the Board of the Directors of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. In addition, he is a member of the Investment Committee of Canadian Friends of Hebrew University and is a past President of the Bathurst JCC. Bruce is a graduate of the prestigious Wexner Heritage Program.

"I am flattered and humbled to receive the Phil Granovsky Award. He was a great philanthropist and community leader. I feel a real sense of duty to help keep Klal Israel strong, and it is a privilege to play a role in helping to make this happen. Our community benefits from great professional leadership and many visionary philanthropists, which makes my role in UJA both enjoyable and inspiring."

Special Achievement Award

DR. GERALD HALBERT, O.C.

Gerry started his longstanding volunteer career in the early 1960s as a canvasser for the Dental Division of UJA. He went on to become the Chair of the division, but it wasn't until participating in a UJA Study Mission to Israel that Gerry understood how much Israel meant to him and, in turn, his Jewish community. The trip was a turning point for Gerry, who proceeded to chair the UJA Campaign Cabinet in 1973 (during the Yom Kippur War), chair the Annual Campaign in 1979, co-chair the Campaign in 1981-1982 (during the Lebanese war) and in 1991 (during Operation Exodus), all periods of global tension, but times where the Toronto Jewish community, under his strong leadership, soared.

Gerry received the Leadership Development Award in 1967, was the Negev Dinner honouree in 1986, and received the Ben Sadowski Award of Merit in 1990. Also involved with the community-at-large, he currently sits on the Governing Council and Executive Committee at the University of Toronto, and on the Board of Directors at the Toronto General and Western Hospital Foundation. A past President of Canadian Friends of Hebrew University and United Israel Appeal of Canada, Gerry received the Order of Canada in 2001.

"It is important that people get involved, particularly young people, because giving back to the community adds a great deal, not only to your life, but to those you are seeking to help. Ultimately, by giving to the community, you receive more than you give through the cultivation of life-long relationships and rewarding experiences. Wealth isn't always the root of giving; anyone can give back in their own way."

Volunteer Excellence: Leadership Development Awards

The awards, established to encourage young men and women to assume community leadership roles, are presented to those individuals who demonstrate extraordinary commitment and service.

ELYSE LACKIE

Elyse is a member of the Board of Governors of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and a member of the Board of Directors of UIA Federations Canada. She has held several leadership positions within UIA and UJA, including Immediate Past Chair of the Young Leadership Division. She is currently a Vice Chair of the JFNA National Young Leadership Cabinet 2010, serving as the Co-Chair of Education/Leadership Development.

On staff at North York General Hospital and an Assistant Professor at the University of Toronto, Elyse is a Governor on the NYGH Foundation Board and is involved in fundraising for a variety of other local and international organizations.

"I am lucky to live in a flourishing Jewish community in a democratic country. Tikkun olam is my way of living Jewishly, and of ensuring a vibrant Jewish life for generations, here and around the world."

ROBERT PALTER

Robert is a Board Member of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, where he sits on the Governance, Human Resources and Strategic Planning committees. He was actively involved in the creation of the current five-year strategic plan for UJA Federation and is a member of the Cabinet. Robert is a former founding Board member of the Jewish Chamber of Commerce.

Beyond the Jewish community, Robert recently finished his term as a Board member of VOICE, an organization that provides advocacy and support for deaf or hearing impaired children and their families. A Senior Partner at McKinsey & Company, he was named one of Canada's Top 40 under 40 in 2006.

"I give back to the community because it reinforces my Jewish identity, strengthens my connection to the community, and makes me happy to be able to help others. I feel fortunate to be able to give back."

LAURIE SHEFF

Laurie has been a volunteer for UJA Federation for many years. She began her association as a canvasser and later co-chaired the ATID initiative to engage the next generation of philanthropic leaders. She is a member of the Executive of UJA's Women's Philanthropy, having co-chaired both the Pacesetter and Lion of Judah divisions over the past few years. Laurie, along with her husband Jonathon Cole, are the Vice Chairs of this year's Walk with Israel 2010.

In addition, Laurie is currently a Board member of Hillel of Greater Toronto.

"Being involved with UJA has given me the opportunity to be an active participant in our community. I've worked with many committed volunteers and dedicated professionals and I have seen the direct results of our collective efforts at home, in Israel and around the world. It is a privilege for me to be able to do this work and a responsibility that I hope my children will carry with them into their adult lives."

Professional Advisory Committee Award of Excellence

This award, from the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, recognizes the outstanding contribution made to the Foundation by professionals in our community. It recognizes the long-term impact their contributions make to lawyers, accountants, estate planners and to the charitable organizations that reap the benefit of their efforts.

AKI CHENCINSKI

Aki is not a stranger to the world of charitable and community-focused endeavours. A member of the Professional Advisory Committee (PAC) of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto for over 25 years, his involvement dates back to the inception of this committee. Aki's extensive experience, knowledge, selflessness and tremendous people skills have made him an invaluable and committed asset within the Jewish Foundation and, by extension, to the entire community.

Aki is a past Board member and Treasurer of Adath Shalom Synagogue, and was recently named Ontario's "Gutsiest" by the Crohn's and Colitis Foundation of Canada for his ongoing fundraising efforts on their behalf.

"I've always tried to contribute in a quiet sort of way to causes that are important to me. If most people would just invest a little (more) time in community and charitable endeavours, our world would be a better place."

Gordy Wolfe Award in Jewish Communal Professional Leadership

This award honours the memory of Gordy Wolfe z"l, the consummate professional who served as Executive Director of Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS) for 22 years. The award recognizes a visionary professional communal leader who, like Gordy, has made a substantive difference in the life of Jewish Toronto.

MARK GRYFE

After chairing UJA's Student Campaign in 1977, Mark embarked on a professional career in Jewish communal life that has spanned 33 years and has seen him hold senior roles in three of Toronto's most respected organizations.

Mark rose quickly through the ranks of UJA and, in 1986 at the age of 30, became the youngest Campaign Director of a major North American city. He led Toronto's campaign for eight years before being named Executive Vice President of Canadian Friends of Hebrew University. In 2000, he became President of the Baycrest Foundation where he created initiatives that have resulted in a tripling of revenues during his tenure.

"Working for the community is a privilege not to be taken lightly. To do so for thirty plus years has provided me with unimagined opportunities and allowed me to work with incredibly talented and committed individuals in the act of community building. Gordy Wolfe was a giant in this regard and it is an honour to stand in his shadow."

Volunteer Excellence: Shem Tov Honourees

Shem Tov Awards are presented, in partnership, to leaders representing the highest level of excellence in volunteer service in Toronto's Jewish community.

KENNETH ALBERT
Mount Sinai Hospital

Kenny has been an integral member of Leadership Sinai since it began in 1993. His commitment to this group has helped develop it into one of Mount Sinai's most important and successful philanthropic programs. With his exemplary leadership, he has set a new standard for staff-volunteer relationships that breeds positive energy, genuine good will and success.

"My parents trained me through selling Cancer Society daffodils at eight and working at every Hadassah bazaar until I was 20. The outstanding research and work at Mount Sinai Hospital makes volunteering and fundraising easy."

ALLAN BROWN
Bernard Betel Centre

Allan is President of Bernard Betel Centre, having previously served on the Budget & Finance and Nominations committees. With his strong belief in strengthening the Jewish community as both a donor and volunteer, he was instrumental in helping establish the Harold and Shirley Lederman Palliative Care Centre at Princess Margaret Hospital and named a "Chair" in Palliative Care at the University of Toronto.

"Toronto is my community and my home. When you live in a community, you give back to it. My family and I believe that this is the centrepiece of what good Jewish values are all about."

TIANA KOFFLER BOYMAN
Koffler Centre of the Arts

Tiana has been a driving force behind the vision of parents, Murray and Marvelle Koffler, with the establishment of the Koffler Centre of the Arts. As President and Chair of the Board of Directors, she has led the Centre with great distinction, reshaping its mission and mandate to be a singular institution in Canada – the only contemporary Jewish cultural institution of its kind, bringing together so many aspects of the arts.

"Through the arts, I dedicate myself to organizations that enhance both our city and pride of place. Inspired by our legendary leaders, I focus my time engaging people towards a better understanding of the diversity of culture."

STANLEY KUGELMASS
Itanu Toronto, UJA Federation's Inclusion Initiative

Stan has been Chair of Itanu Toronto since its inception in 2003. With his guidance, the importance of the inclusion of people with special needs has permeated the Jewish community. A staunch advocate for people with disabilities, he has also served on the Reena Board of Directors and has lent his expertise to help frame government documents improving the lives of people with disabilities.

Stan is a passionate and dedicated volunteer. His commitment towards the community has been unwavering, and he has demonstrated strong leadership through his outstanding advocacy for the inclusion of people with disabilities.

TALI NIZIC
Reena

Tali has been Chair of Reena for the past two years. A committed and caring Board member devoted to the individuals supported by Reena, she is Chair of the Continuous Quality Improvement Committee and sits on the Family Involvement Committee. Tali is a graduate of UJA Federation's Joshua Institute for Jewish Communal Leadership.

"I believe that volunteer work is a great way to gain experience, have fun and make a difference. It is a privilege to learn some invaluable skills and find life-long friendships. My volunteer work gives me a better understanding about different people, the organizations they serve, my community and myself. I am thankful for the unique opportunity I have been given to help others."

S. RICHARD ORZY
Jewish Family and Child

Rick's term as President of the Board of Directors of JF&CS from 2007-2009 was characterized by a powerful mix of strong Jewish values, skill and determination. Under his gifted leadership, JF&CS continued to be there for clients and the community despite difficult economic circumstances and unprecedented challenges faced by the social service sector.

"To me, volunteering in our community goes beyond 'giving back'; it is a key component of our responsibility as Jews, free citizens of Canada and role models for others. It helps us achieve personal fulfillment, while enhancing the lives of others."

SUSAN STEINBERG
Israel Aliyah Centre

Susan established the Aliyah Committee of UJA Federation and the Toronto Aliyah Center in 2007. Her expertise in organizational building and her extensive community involvement have made her an important asset to the Center in Toronto. Her love of Israel and its people helped promote the Center's services and were partly responsible for a significant increase in the number of people making aliyah from Toronto.

"I feel a personal responsibility and obligation to partner with others in effecting creative change in our dedicated Jewish community, in pursuit of a more just, compassionate and better world."

HERB WATERS
JACS Toronto

For the past five years, Herb has been a dedicated volunteer for JACS (Jewish Addiction Community Service). Always making himself available to others, he has often been challenged with difficult and life threatening situations. He is instinctive and quick to act, always with a positive outcome. Making a visible difference in the community, many individuals feel blessed that he has been a part of their lives.

"JACS has given me so much over the years that it is an honour to be able to return what was freely given to me! To know that the help I received in my time of need could be translated into help for others is more than reward enough."

MARK ZARETSKY
JVS Toronto

Mark has a profound interest in JVS clients and a belief that everyone deserves an opportunity to become self-sufficient. Passionate about youth issues, Mark has become an avid fundraiser in support of programs for youth at risk. Mark introduced others to JVS, encouraged them to get involved, and continues be a mentor and role model. As past Chair, he remains an active member of various committees.

"By volunteering at JVS, I was given the opportunity to help those that are less fortunate. Giving back to the community makes me a better person."

WALK WITH ISRAEL 2009 More than 15,000 walkers, sponsors and volunteers, forming a sea of blue and white, took to the streets of downtown Toronto for United Jewish Appeal's annual Walk with Israel, the largest one-day Israel solidarity walk in the Diaspora. The massive turnout expressed the Toronto Jewish community's support of the people of Israel.

Many Faces... One Comm

HAPPY BIRTHDAY, ISRAEL! Over 5,000 enthusiastic community members, reaffirming their unbreakable bond with Israel, came out to Mel Lastman Square to celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel's 62nd birthday on April 20. There was great fun for all - live entertainment, face painting, inflatables, roving performers, arts & crafts and delicious Kosher food! The evening would not have been possible without the tireless efforts of volunteers from UJA Federation and the Prosserman JCC.

ERING THE PAST More than 3,000 people attended nual Community Yom Hashoah Commemoration, it one of the largest single-day gatherings of its kind rael. Held under a tent at Earl Bales Park, participants of part in a program that honoured the memory of the six million Jews murdered during the Holocaust.

SOUR GRAPES FOR ANTI-ISRAEL PROTESTORS
Shortly before Passover 2009, a group of anti-Israel protestors attempted to organize another in a long list of anti-Israeli boycotts; this time calling for Torontonians to boycott Israeli wines at the Summerhill LCBO. Upon hearing news of the proposed boycott, UJA Federation spread the word to the community and quickly the group of 30 pro-Palestinian protestors were met by hundreds of Israel supporters.
Within thirty minutes, the LCBO had sold out of its 1,500 bottles of Israeli kosher wines.

UJA FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO
Across the street. Across the globe.

Many Faces ... One Community

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto expresses profound appreciation to the countless individuals who selflessly volunteer their time and talents through our many community agencies, schools, congregations and organizations. Through their efforts, these dedicated men, women and young adults help build a more cohesive Jewish community which, in turn, preserves and strengthens the quality of Jewish life in Toronto, Canada and Israel.

The willingness of Toronto's Jewish community to volunteer and help one another makes it a model community – one emulated throughout North America.

Celebrating 60 years of friendship

This archival photo shows Israel's prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, centre, being greeted by Canadian prime minister John Diefenbaker, left, in Ottawa in 1961. It was the first visit by an Israeli prime minister to Canada. Subsequently, prime ministers Levi Eshkol, Golda Meir, Menachem Begin, Yitzhak Shamir and Yitzhak Rabin also paid official visits to Canada. Next week, Israel's current prime minister arrives in Canada. He will be the seventh sitting Israeli prime minister to visit Ottawa. Please see related stories on pages 8, 9, 19, 20, 21.

Netanyahu to kick off Toronto's Walk With Israel

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu wants to talk with Toronto's Jewish community.

On Sunday, May 30, one day before his working visit to Ottawa, Netanyahu plans to speak to thousands of Toronto Jews and supporters of Israel to kick off the city's annual Walk With Israel celebration.

The walk commences at 10 a.m. at the Direct Energy Centre, on the grounds of the Canadian National Exhibition, and ends at the energy centre.

Speaking to The CJN last week, Mark Regev, spokesperson for the Israeli Prime Minister's Office, said Netanyahu anticipated a "good, productive" trip to Canada.

He said Netanyahu and the entire Israeli delegation were all "very much looking forward to this visit and to our meetings with the leadership in Canada, specifically with Prime Minister [Stephen] Harper, who is a friend of Israel. And, of course, we're looking forward to meeting the Jewish community."

This is the first working trip by an Israeli prime minister to Canada in 16 years. Yitzhak Rabin was the last premier of the Jewish state to visit this country, in 1994.

"It's been too long since we've had an official visit," Regev added. "We are glad that we're now able to rectify that situation."

The idea to address the Toronto community and participate in the walk originated with Netanyahu himself, according to Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general to Toronto and Western Canada.

A planned address by Netanyahu to the Toronto community "was in discussion ever since the visit became known, but many issues had to be addressed before approval was given. It should be noted that participating was his personal request," Gissin said.

The News in Brief

Canada

Hearing Delayed

OTTAWA — The extradition hearing for an Ottawa sociology professor accused in the 1980 bombing of a Paris synagogue that killed four people was postponed after the Crown disowned handwriting evidence that had been discredited by the defence. A three-week hearing for Hassan Diab was to start June 14, but it has been put off because French authorities plan to bring evidence from a third handwriting expert who says there's a "strong presumption" Diab is the author of a hotel registration card that links him to the bombing, Canwest News reported. The Lebanese-born Diab became a Canadian citizen in 1993.

Ashley Founder Dies

TORONTO — Tillie Abrams, the Jewish woman who founded the iconic William Ashley china store in downtown Toronto in 1947, died May 18 at 98. Abrams came to Canada from Poland as a baby and started working in her parents' paint and wallpaper shop when she was 13. She decided on the made-up name for her store because it was British – like many of her high-end china wares – and gave the impression that a man was behind the business. Her grandson is the company's current CEO.

No Pride Sign Vetting

VANCOUVER — The Vancouver Pride Society won't vet signs in its Aug. 1 Pride Parade, president Ken Coolen said. He told the gay and lesbian paper Xtra that such a move would run counter to the parade's "celebration of diversity." Coolen made the comment in response to Pride Toronto's statements that it won't let anyone march under the banner of Queers Against Israeli Apartheid, which happened in 2009 and provoked Jewish protest. In Toronto, "it was perceived as a racial slur," he said, adding he would consult his board, as well as other groups, if the issue arises in Vancouver.

World

Madoff Play Pulled

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A Jewish theatre in Washington cancelled the world premiere of a play about Bernie Madoff after objections by Elie Wiesel, who was a character in it. Theater J said it pulled its first play of next season, Imagining Madoff, by Deb Margolin, slated for the end of August. The play portrays the convicted Ponzi schemer sitting in his jail cell recalling a fictional, all-night discussion with Wiesel. The Elie Wiesel Foundation for Humanity lost all its assets, $15.2 million, invested with Madoff, and Wiesel personally lost millions. Margolin nixed the play after getting a letter from Wiesel describing it as "obscene" and "defamatory" and threatening to stop it via legal means, the Washington Post reported. Margolin said she used Wiesel in the play because "his name is synonymous with decency, morality, the struggle for human dignity and kindness."

Toronto Federation Builds Student Dorms

EILAT — UJA Federation of Greater Toronto dedicated the first student dorms on the campus of the Eilat branch of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev earlier this month.

The dorms were built at a cost of $4.5 million, including an initial $2.3-million grant from the federation, which is twinned with the Eilat region through the Jewish Agency's Partnership 2000 program. Additional funding came from the Rashi Foundation, Ben-Gurion University and the Eilat municipality. About 1,100 students are enrolled at the Eilat branch of BGU. About 75 per cent of them come from outside the city to study.

The first group of 72 students is slated to move into the dorms for the fall semester. In the summer, the dorm rooms will be rented out to tourists. Several more residential halls are planned, with a total capacity of 500 students.

The Toronto federation has been supporting educational and public health projects in Eilat for many years. The organization initiated the dormitory project after students complained about difficulties in finding affordable housing in Eilat. It's hoped that the new dorms will help to attract more students from outside Eilat to the university as well as to provide a campus atmosphere.

A delegation of 32 major donors and community leaders from Canada came to Eilat for the May 10 dedication ceremony. During the visit, the federation said it was providing scholarships to 303 university students in Eilat.

"Through the construction of the dorms, and providing a roof for students, we complete the circle of aid to the students in Eilat. We provide more than 500 scholarships for students on campus," federation president Ted Sokolsky said.

Azrieli to give $1 billion to charitable foundations

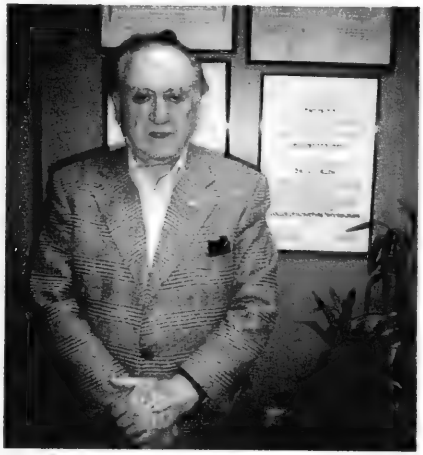
Part of company to be offered for public sale on Tel Aviv Stock Exchange

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Charitable foundations in Canada and Israel will benefit from a billion-dollar infusion of capital as a result of David Azrieli's restructuring of his Israeli-based business.

For the first time since its founding 27 years ago, part of the Azrieli Group Ltd. will be offered for public sale. The huge commercial real estate conglomerate, which built Israel's first enclosed shopping mall in 1985 and whose flagship is the triple skyscrapers in Tel Aviv, is about to list 25 per cent of its shares on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange.

The company hopes to raise $728 million (US) at $25 a share, bringing its worth to almost $2.9 billion, which would make it Israel's largest public real estate company.



David Azrieli

The other 75 per cent will be owned by Azrieli and his four children, three of whom live in Canada.

It is the largest initial public offering ever on the Tel Aviv exchange, and 13 underwriters are handling the transaction. If successful, the Azrieli Group will be the ninth-largest firm on the blue-chip Tel Aviv 25 index, bigger – its founder points out – than the Israel Discount Bank.

The prospectus was approved by the Israel Securities Authority on May 11. Institutional investors will be able to buy as of May 31, and the general public by June 3.

Azrieli's current personal stake is 40 per cent, and that of his son, Rafi, 15 per cent, which together are currently worth about $1.2 billion. When the public shares are sold, Azrieli, as chairman of the board, will retain 30 per cent of the company's equity, while his four children will each own 11.25 per cent.

The offering's prospectus states that Azrieli and his son intend to donate all or most of their holdings to charitable foundations.

Azrieli, who turned 88 this month, said he expects the transfer to be made in his lifetime, in an interview at his office in the historic Dominion Square building, which he owns.

Responding to BDS

From the editor's desk...

John Greyson, the Toronto filmmaker, last month urged Margaret Atwood, the renowned Toronto writer, to decline the prestigious literary Dan David Prize in Tel Aviv as a way of supporting "the growing boycott movement which is trying to achieve peace in the region."

That the boycott movement is growing is, sadly, very true. That it is trying to achieve peace in the region is also, sadly, true. But the peace that the BDS proponents envision is the tranquillity of soul they would experience without the existence of a Jewish state called Israel. It would be the peace that follows death.

Only the Jewish state is not willing to die so that the boycott hopefuls should feel good.

The official name of the website is Global BDS Movement: Boycott – Divestment – Sanctions for Palestine. (Their emphasis)

The website asserts: "Building and strengthening a global BDS movement has become a core aim for many involved in today's solidarity work for Palestine."

The website further elaborates: "A clear majority of Palestinian civil society called upon international civil society organizations and people of conscience all over the world to impose broad boycotts and implement divestment initiatives against Israel, similar to those applied to South Africa in the apartheid era." (My emphasis)

They leave no doubt about their ultimate objective: to dismantle Israel after the fashion and for the same reason that Apartheid South Africa was dismantled.

Thankfully, Atwood refused to be cowed by Greyson. She boycotted the boycotters.

The BDS movement for which Greyson is a piquant advocate is growing.

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks places that movement in the context of a "world turned upside down" since the turn of the millennium. In his most recent work, Future Tense: Jews, Judaism and Israel in the Twenty-First Century (Schocken Books), he writes: "The peace process foundered, to be replaced first with an intifadah, then with an almost ceaseless wave of suicide bombings, then with missile attacks from Lebanon in the north, Gaza in the south. Israel found itself surrounded not just by enemies – that much it has always known – but by terrorist groups, themselves funded by and proxies for states committed to Israel's destruction as a matter of non-negotiable religious conviction.

"Nor was the attack merely physical: it was political as well. Israel found itself at the receiving end of a vastly ramified, international campaign of delegitimization, instigated by non-governmental organizations, academics and sections of the media, becoming the only nation among the 192 making up the United Nations to find its very right to be and to defend its citizens called into question."

Supporters of Israel in Geneva two years ago

Leslie Susser wrote in the April 26th issue of The Jerusalem Report about what Rabbi Sacks so aptly describes – the vastly ramified, international campaign of delegitimization.

In last week's column, I brought readers' attention to the existential repercussions, according to Susser, of the expanding international campaign. In this week's column, I touch upon some of the possible responses to the campaign that Susser evoked from a variety of experts.

Eran Shayshon, one of the authors of a seminal report written on the subject by the non-partisan think-tank, the Reut Institute, calls upon Israel's decision-makers "first to internalize the fact that the country is facing a challenge with potentially existential repercussions."

The problem, Shayshon says, should be addressed by the national security establishment. He also calls for the complete overhaul of Israel's Foreign Service. He recommends building "anti-delegitimization networks based on Jewish and Israel groups abroad, including NGOs."

Shayshon is also a strong advocate of the "rebranding" effort, despite its rather obvious marketing connotations. Echoing the oft-quoted comments and thinking of Amir Gissin, the consul general of Israel for Toronto and Western Canada, Shayshon told Susser: "Israel is an excellent product with terrible branding. Anyone who comes here will immediately see it is not an apartheid state. We need to close the perception gap by showing people what Israel really is."

Noam Lemelshtrich-Latar, dean of the School of Communications at the Herzliya Interdisciplinary Centre, told Susser that the government should create a new media operations centre, operated by an NGO or a research institute to grapple with the burgeoning networks of cyber advocates who place all sorts of vile material about Israel in cyberspace.

Susser canvassed a number of experts for their respective approaches in dealing with Israel's delegitimizers.

They all agreed that the problem is urgent. Shrugging one's shoulder – in indifference, apathy or as an act, simply, of acknowledged personal helplessness – is not an option.

The time is now. For all of us.

Refugee claims from Israel lowest since '01

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

Israel's oft-repeated pleas to Canada that the Jewish state does not produce refugees may be getting through.

Figures obtained by The CJN from the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) reveal that Canada's acceptance rate of refugees from Israel in 2009 was the lowest in nine years.

Of 293 refugee claims from Israel finalized last year, just 15 were approved—an acceptance rate of five per cent, the lowest since 2001.

The IRB rejected 198 claims from Israel last year. The rest were either abandoned or withdrawn. A further 921 claims from Israel are still pending.

Ottawa's acceptance of claimants from Israel has been dropping steadily since 2005, when the approval rate was 31 per cent.

Canada's acceptance of those who claim a "well-founded fear of persecution" in Israel has been a sore point between the two countries since the early 1990s, when the first waves of Jews leaving the former Soviet Union began arriving in Israel under the Law of Return.

Many of these émigrés then springboarded to other countries, including Canada, claiming they were persecuted in Israel. Typically, the asylum-seekers alleged that while in the Jewish state, they faced discrimination and were denied jobs and housing, and even threatened and harassed because of mixed marriages or questionable status as Jews.

Israel has always argued that as a democratic, multicultural nation, it does not produce refugees. The Israeli argument has always been that claimants' stories of persecution are spurious and designed simply to gain entry to other countries.

In 2005, Israel's absorption ministry reported that nearly nine per cent of immigrants from former Soviet republics leave Israel, with Canada being a favourite destination.

The IRB does not track the reasons, whether political, religious or personal, for granting asylum. Neither does it keep records of the birthplace of claimants.

Edward Corrigan, a London, Ont.-based immigration lawyer who has handled several claims from Arab-Israelis, says the "bulk" of refugee claims from Israel are no longer from ex-Soviets but from Palestinians and Arabs who hold Israeli citizenship.

He said some claimants have alleged they were pressured into spying for Israeli intelligence agencies, putting them at great risk. Some of his clients, Corrigan noted, have alleged they were "coerced" and "blackmailed" into spying for Israel.

Over the past five years, he said he has won five cases and lost seven involving refugee claims by Arabs with Israeli citizenship.

Corrigan said he "has not heard of any" Israeli Arabs whose claims failed and who faced grave danger on their return to Israel, though "there have been consequences." Those, he said, have included Israel's refusal to renew Israeli passports and travel documents.

Corrigan stressed that Israel has many "strong and vibrant" human rights organizations advocating on behalf of Jews and Arabs alike.

He said he's currently representing a refugee claimant who is a conscientious objector to Israel's mandatory military service. The man is a Russian Christian who came to Israel under the Law of Return and fears returning.

The IRB has a separate category of claimants from "Palestine," who are technically stateless under international refugee statutes. These claimants may have resided in the West Bank or Gaza, or filed claims against their country of residence.

IRB numbers on Palestine show that in 2009, 62 per cent, or 39 of the 63 cases finalized, were granted asylum. The success rate the year before was 79 per cent.

Corrigan said claimants from the West Bank and Gaza often face danger of persecution or worse if they were even suspected of collaborating with Israel.

A spokesperson at Israel's embassy in Ottawa had no comment on the latest IRB numbers for Israel.

Israel-Canada ties: 'deep, vital, constant'

On April 7, 1962, on the occasion of the granting of the Histadrut Award for humanitarianism to then-Canadian prime minister John Diefenbaker, Israel's eloquent, insightful and scholarly ambassador to Canada, Yaacov Herzog spoke about the friendship between Canada and Israel. He speculated about the source of the friendship in terms that resonated with Diefenbaker.

The Jewish state had been founded barely 13 years earlier. The remarkable conditions surrounding Israel's birth were still fresh in the mind. Not too many people had given the Jewish state much of a chance of surviving the onslaught of five Arab armies.

Not too many people had given the Jewish people much of a chance of emerging whole - in any meaningful sense of the word - from the devastation of the Shoah.

Herzog understood the modern rebirth of Jewish sovereignty in large, historical and theological terms. "The inner significance of [Israel's] revival is related to a vindication of the spiritual over the material factor in human survival," he said.

And he knew that Diefenbaker and a large swath – if not the majority – of the Canadian people also understood it on that basis.

"The Prime Minister of Canada," Herzog said, "has over decades shown a deeply sensitive appreciation for the spiritual motives of Israel reborn, its rise and onward progress."

Herzog then added: "How else can one explain the consistent friendship between two parties so disparate in area, in resources, in capacity, a link sustained neither by defensive alliance, by powerful economic stakes, by geography, by common experience, yet [is] nonetheless deep and vital and constant?"

On the eve of the visit to Canada in a few days by Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, it is important to be reminded of these words and of the life-affirming values that underlie them. His visit is a definitive affirmation of the Canada-Israel friendship. In a world where interests trump friendships, this very special friendship is worth celebrating. It reaches higher than merely good bilateral relationships. It is a heartening testament in a world of frequently occurring disheartening developments – especially in relation to the only Jewish state on earth – of two democracies standing side by side. The Harper government has repeatedly affirmed the strength and the permanence of that testament.

Ambassador Herzog poignantly described the link between Canada and Israel as being "deep, vital and constant." It was a depiction of the relationship as he saw it nearly half a century ago. His words ring true today. They are our aspiration, if not quite a promise, for the future as well.

The first round of bilateral talks between Israel and Egypt ended in Cairo with progress on most issues, such as the creation of joint teams to search for the bodies of Israeli soldiers missing in Sinai since the 1973 Yom Kippur War. A sticking point was Taba, the strip of beach on the Gulf of Aqaba near Eilat, which was claimed by both sides. More talks were planned before sending the dispute to international arbitration, as demanded by Egypt.

Brandeis distorted and misrepresented

The editor of The CJN was correct when he wrote that there was a protest at Brandeis University against the selection of Israeli Ambassador Michael Oren to deliver the commencement address on May 23 ("'A devastatingly sad day,'" Editor's desk, May 13). But he was wrong in his assessment of its significance, and mistaken in his generalizations about the academic culture and attitude toward Israel at Brandeis. He wrote: "A great many students and faculty were upset" and implied that the campus was in an uproar. That was not the case.

Here are the facts: as reported by the Jerusalem Post and JTA, about 150 students, faculty and others signed a petition protesting the invitation to Oren. More than 5,000 signed a petition supporting his appearance. Some members of the faculty objected to Oren, but a suggestion floated in the university senate to register public displeasure at the invitation got nowhere.

You said students who defended the invitation to Oren were "cravenly cautious," in their defence and that the author of the pro-Oren petition could not bring himself to utter the name "Israel." Here is that student's explanation of why he started the petition, as published in the Jerusalem Post: "I wanted [Brandeis] President [Jehuda] Reinharz to know that there are students who are happy to have Oren come. Brandeis is a very friendly campus to Zionism and Israel."

Brandeis is not exceptional in the diversity of opinion among its faculty and students. One can imagine a similar level of content and discontent about representatives of the Israeli government at Israeli universities, including my former institution, Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

Brandeis' Schusterman Center for Israel Studies has created a successful paradigm for how an academic institution can combat ignorance and malice by exposing complexity of information and diversity of views. The Brandeis Summer Institute for Israel Studies has attracted senior and junior faculty – Christians, Muslims and Jews – from more than 140 universities. These rigorously scholarly efforts have spawned hundreds of courses on Israel, literally around the world.

There are conflicts over Israel and its policies on and off campus, in Israel and across the world. But you have done readers a disservice by distorting and misrepresenting the situation at Brandeis. Our campus can in no sense be characterized as hostile, or even cool, toward Israel.

Anti-Semitic crime stats

Federation CJA and Quebec Jewish Congress spokespeople do a disservice to the community with their suggestion that B'nai Brith – which has had a formidable presence in Quebec for the past 130 years – has no profile or credibility ("Anti-Semitic crime stats refuted by Jewish leaders," May 13). We work daily with law enforcement and grassroots Quebecers on issues concerning the safety and welfare of the community. Our services to the elderly and disadvantaged – affordable housing, holiday food baskets and other supports – have made a difference in the lives of many vulnerable individuals, while our League for Human Rights builds bridges with other communities in the fight against all hatred and bigotry.

Regardless of what The CJN's anonymous "highly placed source" claims, the recent crime wave in Montreal was no trivial matter. B'nai Brith was approached by numerous members of the community concerned for their safety. They reached out to us for assistance and we responded. And this is where our strategy differs. We feel it is necessary to address issues head on, rather than prevaricating. We were the first Jewish organization to point to the growing problem of anti-Semitism in the guise of anti-Israel agitation on campus. We are still the only mainstream Jewish organization in this country to sound the alarm on radical Islam, and the threats to freedom and democracy it poses.

We feel it is counterproductive for one community organization to denigrate another, and wonder why a newspaper like The CJN would encourage such divisiveness. We should all be focusing on the same objectives – working cooperatively to promote the best interests of the community. We regret that some seem to have lost sight of such goals. For our part, we stand ready to meet with Federation CJA in Montreal to discuss how to repair the serious breach in community unity that this unwarranted attack on B'nai Brith represents.

Canada is a true ally of Israel

By SHIMON FOGEL

"Did you hear the news? Guess who's coming to town." The buzz surrounding Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's upcoming visit to Canada has been the focus of much animated conversation throughout the Jewish community. Why is that? After all, the vast majority of those caught up in the excitement are not privy to the specific agenda that will dominate the bilateral discussions during this brief, official visit. Indeed, even the upward of 20,000 participants in the UJA Walk with Israel in Toronto who will greet and be addressed by the Israeli premier will not have an opportunity to engage directly with him. Yet the excitement prevails, not just in Toronto, but also across the country. What is it about this cameo appearance that prompts such an emotional reaction among Canadian Jews?

In truth, as welcome as "Bibi's" visit is, the passionate and heartfelt reaction expressed by the pro-Israel community is related to something larger than the force of one individual's personality. It is about something much more fundamental. It is about Israel, and it is about Israel and Canada. In many respects, the Canada-Israel relationship has served as a zeitgeist of the Jewish condition in Canada – how "safe" we feel, the extent to which we as a community are accepted as a valued contributor to Canadian society, and the legitimacy attached to our collective narrative.

Nowhere is that reality check more acutely evident than within the political sector. Canada's relationship with Israel, its policies toward the Jewish state, its pronouncements on the conflict, the positions Canada adopts within the myriad of international forums, and the level of bilateral co-operation – taken together, all of these things have served as an essential scorecard for Jews regarding their place within this great country. So on the eve of Netanyahu's visit, it is not out of place for us to ask ourselves: how are we doing? Have we made progress? Is it "safe"?

The short answer is "yes." Despite all of the difficult challenges out there, the Canada-Israel bilateral relationship is stronger, more vital and promising than at any time in the 60 years since we first established formal diplomatic relations. Canada was instrumental in facilitating the rebirth of the Jewish state, and in all the subsequent decades, successive Canadian governments have nurtured the friendship and helped it grow in depth and scope. The milestones are many and they chronicle the maturation of a relationship that has evolved into a complex, multi-layered kinship that speaks to mutual strategic interests, shared values, synergistic economic growth and common aspirations for ourselves and the family of nations.

Yet for all that has been achieved – the space agency agreements and the trade missions, the joint projects in the developing world and the health-care partnerships, the co-operative efforts of the two Supreme Courts and the academic exchanges – often, what has had the most enduring impact are the words. The words of praise and criticism. The words of support and those of isolation. The words of understanding and the words of indifference, and sometimes, the absence of any words.

> 'Perhaps the most important pronouncement came from then-prime minister Brian Mulroney during the most intense period of the first Palestinian intifadah, when he confronted the canard of dual loyalties'

We have all learned that, unlike the childhood rhyme, words do have power. They can hurt and harm as well as comfort and heal. They can also validate or undermine, and as we cast an eye back to an assessment of the bilateral relationship, we discover that more often than not, the words of Canadian political actors have served to validate Israel and Canadian Jewish support for Israel rather than contribute to Israel's isolation within the international community.

Ironically, even though polls suggest that politicians are not held in the greatest of esteem, their words and the opinions they articulate carry substantial weight. In a way, politicians have served as the ultimate "third party validators" – providing a "hechsher" of sorts for Israel's supporters in Canada.

Perhaps the most important pronouncement came from then-prime minister Brian Mulroney during the most intense period of the first Palestinian intifadah, when he confronted the canard of "dual loyalties" and proclaimed that Canadian Jewish support for and love of Israel complement their commitment to and pride in Canada. It was a seminal moment in the Canadian Jewish experience and has coloured the public policy debate ever since. It provided a new context in which to understand the historic address by then-Israeli president, Chaim Herzog, to a joint session of Parliament. A survivor who had rebuilt his shattered life in Canada after the Holocaust – my father – sat in the gallery during that address. More than 20 years later, he still regards that event as the highlight of his life: a Jew who received sanctuary in Canada, sitting in the Canadian icon of freedom and democracy, listening to the president of the Jewish state share words with Canadian parliamentarians.

There have been other words, too. Then-opposition leader Jean Chrétien called the Canada-Israel Committee at 1 a.m. on the night the first scuds rained down on Israel during the First Gulf War in 1991, expressing his distress and pledging, even in opposition, that Canada would always be a source of support for her sister democracy in the Middle East. Following in the footsteps of his predecessor, Mulroney, who established the extraordinarily successful high-tech partnership between Israel and Canada, Chrétien made good on his word and established a free trade agreement with Israel – the first between Canada and any country outside North America.

Many have been the politicians who have added their words of support and solidarity – too many to chronicle here. Leaving aside the much-valued contribution of Jewish parliamentarians over the years, a few bear particular mention, because they speak to crucial dimensions of the relationship or special aspects of our experience:

- Current Treasury Board President and former Canadian Alliance leader Stockwell Day, whose purity of support for Israel reassured Jews about a new political phenomenon that was entirely foreign to their experience.
- Liberal MP Joe Volpe, who cut short a trip to China during the worst days of the second intifadah in order to stand in solidarity with Canadian Jews confronting the violence that had erupted in the Middle East and had spread unprecedented and vitriolic hatred to Canada.
- Bloc Québécois leader Lucien Bouchard and his successor, Gilles Duceppe, whose words of understanding and friendship forever dispelled the myth that support for Israel was inimical to passionate Quebecers.
- Former prime minister Paul Martin, who publicly enshrined the idea of shared values between Canada and Israel, along with his foreign minister, Pierre Pettigrew, who validated our fears about the Iranian regime and who served as the first western politician to draw a linkage between Iran's nuclear program and its threats to annihilate the Jewish state.
- Liberal Leader Michael Ignatieff, who eloquently but unequivocally stripped Israeli Apartheid Week promoters of any credibility in his public condemnation of that toxic, anti-Israel initiative.
- And the courageous members of the NDP caucus, individuals such as Deputy Leader Thomas Mulcair, who have consistently challenged the radical element that has sought to capture the soul of their party.

All of these words and the many, many other people they represent have been welcome. The validation and friendship they stand for are cherished reminders of our place in Canada.

But of all the words spoken in 60-plus years, none have been so needed or so valued as those articulated by the current government. In Israel's darkest hours, Prime Minister Stephen Harper offered comfort and courageous leadership. In a time of political correctness gone wildly awry, his ministers have consistently chosen integrity over expediency. This government has established a new benchmark for the bilateral relationship, one that established Canada as a true ally rather than a "fair-weather friend," and in a fundamental way, one that has captured the essence of all the good words spoken over the last 60 years.

It is a good time for a visit. It is a good time to celebrate the nature of the Canada-Israel friendship – both for what it is and what it promises to be.

A first in Israel

Israel's formal celebration of its Independence Day always begins with a ceremony on Mount Herzl in Jerusalem, in which distinguished citizens light 12 torches representing the biblical 12 tribes. This year, one of the torches was lit by a Reform rabbi – a first in the history of the Jewish state.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Rabbi Asher Richard Hirsch came to Israel from his native United States in the 1970s. His distinguished career in the American Reform movement includes the founding of its now famed Religious Action Center in Washington D.C. When he became the executive director of the World Union for Progressive Judaism, one of his conditions was that its headquarters be moved to Jerusalem.

Though it may have been more expedient to run the organization out of New York, Rabbi Hirsch was determined to help shift the focus of Reform Judaism to the Jewish state. He believed that this symbolic act would make a strong point. His dual aim has always been to bring Zion to Reform and Reform to Zion.

With this in mind, he brought the World Union into the World Zionist Organization (WZO) and was instrumental in creating ARZENU, the international organization of Reform Zionists, of which ARZA Canada is a constituent and influential member. (Most of the ARZENU presidents have been Canadians. The current incumbent is Joan Garson of Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto, a past president of ARZA Canada.)

Rabbi Hirsch retired more than a decade ago and is now the organization's honorary life president. His achievements in Israel include being instrumental in establishing the two Reform kibbutzim and building the Centre for Reform Judaism in Jerusalem.

He has also held important positions in the WZO and is currently, for a second time, the chair of its general council.

To soften the potential blow of a Reform rabbi lighting one of the torches, the powers that be wanted it to be known that his honour was due to his place in the WZO hierarchy. Perhaps as a further concession to opponents, the organizers partnered Rabbi Hirsch with a young woman from the Jewish National Fund.

However, none of this fazed Rabbi Hirsch. At the ceremony, he spoke about his Reform career and his role in bringing Reform Judaism to Israel. For whatever the Israeli establishment would like to think, and however much Orthodox politicians and their secular accomplices seek to claim a franchise on Judaism, religious pluralism is there to stay, and Reform will continue to play a growing part in it.

The symbolism of Rabbi Hirsch's participation in the ceremony has many dimensions and important implications for Israel.

New limb, new growth

I recently travelled to Minsk, Belarus, to consult for my former employer, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. The event was an annual team gathering of the JDC group that works in the republics of the former Soviet Union (FSU). I remember when, in 1989, that team had six people. Now, there there were more than 60 souls at the three-day set of meetings. It brought back memories and a great deal of warm nostalgia. It also evoked some perspective and the concomitant analysis.

Seymour Epstein in Toronto

When glasnost and perestroika allowed the Jews of the Soviet Union to be reunited with their sisters and brothers around the world, there were already at least three organizations in place ready to provide assistance. The liaison bureau of the government of Israel was already there, quietly. The Jewish Agency for Israel was ready to immediately absorb all three million (more or less, depending on which demographer you follow). And the JDC had been waiting for decades to re-enter and do its work openly. We had been there before the revolution. A variety of religious groups, from Chabad to the World Union for Progressive Judaism, also set up shop very quickly.

Of course, there were reports of overlap, duplication and conflict, but in retrospect, all the organizations at work in the 11 time zones of the FSU had one common goal: to help these Jews re-unite with their Judaism. For most, thankfully, that meant aliyah to Israel. Others took longer to decide and wished to re-create Jewish life, mostly ex nihilo. Others would never leave due to age or infirmity. These last two categories were the domain of the JDC mission. There were some who opted for emigration to yet another part of the Diaspora – hopefully a kinder one.

That early period of the 1990s produced many poignant moments of Jewish history. More Jews learned Hebrew in that time than in any other period of Jewish life. Thousands of Russian-speaking children were absorbed into the Israeli school system in a very brief period of time. Indeed, Israel absorbed a population equivalent to the United States taking in all of Canada and Australia. Within 10 years, the tiny Jewish population of united Germany grew to become the second-largest group of Jews in continental Europe. As significant and as miraculous as the re-birth of the Hebrew language at the beginning of the 20th century was the re-attachment to the body of the Jewish people of an old/new limb of three million souls at the very end of the same century.

So there I was in Minsk, in April 2010 watching a small community of Jews re-engineering itself into religion, culture, welfare, education, memory and hope. The new limb is no longer new to a young Jew born in 1990. She has Russian-speaking Jewish brothers and sisters living in Israel, Germany, Sweden and America – in Moscow, Kiev, Minsk, Almaty, Bishkek, Khabarovsk and even Thornhill. And he's comfortable in his skin.

There was a time when all of us were concerned about what we could do for FSU Jews – how we could help them through the trauma of re-attachment. Now we should be more excited about what these new Jews can do for us in the 21st century. They have a rich tradition of Russian culture in literature, music, dance and the plastic arts. They know more Hebrew than most of us. They bring a fresh outsider's perspective to our ancient tradition. They have more family connections in Israel than most of us, and are thus intimately connected with the Jewish state. They come from a region that gave us the Zionist revolution and modern Hebrew.

If we open ourselves to them, they can contribute profoundly to whatever twists and turns our Judaism will take in this new century. Those of us who find Jewish continuity an inadequate prescription for the Jewish future should look to our Russian-speaking siblings for the creative force that has kept us flourishing from generation to generation.

Midrash Rabba: Jewish tradition and women rabbis

The headline of this column is a play on words. Midrash Rabbah is the name of an early compendium of midrashim, or narrative commentaries on the Bible. But I intend it also to signify a midrash, or commentary, on rabba, the proposed title for female Orthodox rabbis, were there to be such an entity.

As many readers are aware, an Orthodox yeshiva in New York headed by Rabbi Avi Weiss has been training women to take on rabbinic functions under the title of maharat. While modern Orthodoxy contains a wide range of views on the potential religious role of women, the consensus appeared to tolerate this expansion of possibilities.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

However, when, earlier this year, Rabbi Weiss conferred upon the first woman to complete the program the title of "rabba" – a feminization of the word "rav" – he outraged many Orthodox rabbis who saw this as going too far. Under pressure from his rabbinic colleagues, Rabbi Weiss agreed to revert to the title maharat, although without removing the title of rabba from the sole woman upon whom it has been conferred.

It was in response to the rabba controversy that the Rabbinic Council of America, the largest body of Orthodox rabbis in North America, issued its "Resolution on Women's Communal Roles in Orthodox Jewish Life." Passed without dissent at the RCA's annual conference, the resolution made clear the organization's view on the issue, saying that "we cannot accept either the ordination of women or the recognition of women as members of the Orthodox rabbinate, regardless of the title."

Given the many strong reactions against the title rabba, this conclusion was not surprising. But equally noteworthy, the resolution carried language strongly affirming the religious accomplishments of women, both as scholars and community leaders. "The flowering of Torah study and teaching by God-fearing Orthodox women in recent decades," the resolution begins, "stands as a significant achievement." It goes on to encourage "a diversity of halachically and communally appropriate professional opportunities for learned, committed women."

About a century ago, the Bais Yaakov movement revolutionized the Orthodox world by establishing centres of serious Jewish learning for women, something deeply controversial in its time. The RCA resolution affirms the rightness of that sea change and of its consequences to the shape of the Jewish world and gendered roles today. "Young Orthodox women are now being reared, educated, and inspired by mothers, teachers and mentors who are themselves beneficiaries of advanced women's Torah education."

"How ya gonna' keep them down on the farm after they've seen Paree?" an old song asked. Indeed: how ya gonna' keep them down in the shul after they've seen Baba Kama?

While the RCA resolution falls far short of embracing the ordination of women, it didn't slam the door on that possibility. Many readers were struck by what the resolution didn't say: that the ordination of women as rabbis is absolutely forbidden by Halachah. Instead, it explained the resolution's conclusion as an outcome of the RCA's "commitment to sacred continuity." To invoke the terms used by American novelist Cynthia Ozick to think about women in Orthodox Judaism, the matter is treated as "sociological" (and so open to change) rather than "theological" (and hence, immutable).

The Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance (JOFA) pointed to another resolution passed at the RCA convention that affirmed the diversity of ideologies and halachic opinions within Orthodoxy, casting them in the same language that the Talmud uses to describe the legitimacy of the divergent religious opinions of the houses of Hillel and Shamai: "eilu ve-eilu divrei Elokim Chayyim" – these and these are the words of the Living God. Such valuing of diversity, JOFA notes, keeps alive the possibility for "learned, God-fearing women to become authoritative, communal religious leaders."

In fact, although they are, thus far, in the minority, some Orthodox rabbis have issued detailed responsa about the halachic viability of ordaining female rabbis, pointing to biblical, talmudic, and historical precedents for women assuming the functions and authorities of a rabbi.

Perhaps a century from now, we'll take for granted the presence of the rabba – a tikkun olam in our time.

The Kirshner File

A life tragically cut short

The words are heartbreaking, so simple yet so shattering. On Dec. 24, 1943, less than eight months before she and her family were betrayed by an anonymous caller informing the German security police that Jews could be found in hiding at 267 Prinsengracht, Anne Frank wrote this entry in her diary: "I long to ride a bike, dance, whistle, look at the world, feel young and know that I'm free."

Sheldon Kirshner in Amsterdam

Precocious, feisty and fiercely intelligent, Anne was a slip of a girl when she set down these yearning thoughts. Doomed by the Nazi occupation of the Netherlands and Adolf Hitler's racist fantasies, she would never live long enough to translate her wishes into realities or become a full-fledged woman. Probably the most famous victim of the Holocaust, Anne was one of more than one million Jewish children whose fate was irretrievably sealed when Germany invaded the Netherlands in May 1940 and proceeded to marginalize, persecute and deport its Jewish minority.

The gabled house in Amsterdam where she lived for about 25 months, from July 6, 1942 until Aug. 4, 1944, has been converted into a shrine and a museum. Toured by millions of visitors since its opening on May 3, 1960, Anne Frank House – Anne Frank Huis in Dutch – perpetuates the memory of a remarkable teenager whose diary has been published in scores of countries and whose fleeting life has been the subject of an avalanche of biographies, plays, movies and television dramas, the latest of which was broadcast on the PBS network just last month.

The faces of Anne Frank

Adjacent to a canal and close to the imposing Westermarkt church at the corner of the street, Anne Frank House is in a gentrified neighbourhood dotted with cafes, restaurants, boutiques and art galleries. Before the war, however, this charming district was rather drab and unprepossessing. Anne's father, Otto, set up his new business here shortly after the German army marched into the Netherlands.

An assimilated German Jew, Otto left Frankfurt – where Anne and her sister, Margot, were born – in the wake of Hitler's accession to power in 1933. Thousands of Jews like the Franks immigrated to the Netherlands after Nazism took hold in Germany. Having established himself in Amsterdam, Otto sent for his wife, Edith, and their two daughters. The Franks lived in a flat in a four-storey beige brick apartment building at 39 Merwedplein. In a small park opposite the building stands a stylized statue of Anne, her feet resting on a maroon marble pedestal. The Buitenveldert neighbourhood where Otto and his family settled is full of such faceless cookie cutter buildings. Since many Dutch Jews live here today, the Shalom seniors home, the Maimonides High School, the Rosh Pina elementary school and a kosher butcher shop are all within walking distance.

Otto and his family went in to hiding as the deportation of Jews began. The building on Prinsengracht where they found refuge was originally a 17th-century private residence and then a warehouse and a household appliances plant.

The offices and warehouse of Otto's companies, Opekta and Pectacon – which sold the fruit extract pectin as well as herbs, spices and pickling salts – were located on the ground floor. The secret annex, or back part of the building, was where the Franks hid from the Nazis and their Dutch collaborators. Concealed from view by houses on all four sides, it was a seemingly perfect sanctuary. The annex itself was covered by a bookcase.

No one but Otto's most trusted Christian employees – Miep Gies, Bep Voskuijl, Johannes Kleiman and Victor Kugler – were privy to the arrangement. They provided the Franks and their boarders – Hermann, Auguste and Peter van Pels and Fritz Pfeffer – with food, newspapers and books.

Though Anne described the space in which they all lived as relatively luxurious compared to other hiding places, it was really a cramped and dim haven, with a floor space of about 500 square feet.

Anne, an aspiring journalist, started keeping a diary in a red-and-green plaid cloth autograph book her father gave her on her 13th birthday on June 12, 1942. Her last entry was on Aug. 1, 1944. She used the diary to examine her relationship with her family and reflect on her isolation and fear of discovery. As she put it on July 11, 1942, "We're very afraid the neighbours might hear or see us."

Anne Frank House in Amsterdam

As you enter Anne Frank House, the first objects in your line of vision are four large photographs of Anne. She looks forward, smiling sweetly, in two photographs. She glances sideways in another one. In the last photograph, she plays with her fingers.

An entry from her diary, dated April 9, 1944, is inscribed on a wall: "The time will come when we will be people again and not just Jews." A picture of Anne gazing out from a balcony then appears.

The dimly lit rooms have been picked clean of furniture, clothes and personal belongings, all of which were seized and distributed to families in Germany.

When the Franks left their flat for the secret annex, they deliberately left it in a state of disarray so that the Nazis would think that they had emigrated. A postcard written by Otto to his relatives in Basel, Switzerland leaves that impression.

To prevent his companies from being confiscated by the Nazis, Otto transferred them to his employees. A letter attests to this transaction. In a video, Gies recalls the day when Otto asked her for help.

A staircase leads to a scale model of the secret annex, while a rare photograph depicts a razzia, a German roundup of Dutch Jews. The book case concealing the secret annex leads to a very steep staircase.

A small room contains Margot's Latin lessons and Otto's map of the Allied Normandy invasion. Pencil marks on a wall, drawn by Otto, enabled him to keep track of his daughters' growth. The walls of Anne's bedroom are plastered with pictures and cuttings.

The kitchen is bare, with only a counter and a sink. The window in the closed-off attic reveals the sky and branches of a tree.

An Oct. 9, 1942 entry from Anne's diary reads, "The English radio says they're [Jews] being gassed. I feel terribly upset."

The arrest and deportation of the hapless inhabitants of the secret annex are chronicled at length in a separate room. Anne's formal name, Anneliese, chillingly appears on a Nazi deportation list. A rare film clip of a transport leaving the Westerbork camp for Auschwitz foreshadows their fate.

Margot contracted typhus and died in Bergen-Belsen in March 1945. Anne succumbed a few days later. Edith died in Auschwitz, while Otto survived. Hermann van Pels was gassed in Auschwitz. His wife died en route from Bergen-Belsen to Theresienstadt. Their son died in Mauthausen's sick bay.

Toward the close of the self-guided tour, an overhead monitor continually replays a video in which Otto expresses surprise concerning the depth of Anne's feelings. "Most parents don't know really their children," he intones sombrely.

Near the exit door is a glass case inside which is a facsimile of Anne's diary. After she was deported, Gis and Voskuijl retrieved it among personal effects. When Otto returned to Amsterdam after the war, he was given Anne's diary and notebooks. Published first in Dutch in 1947, the diary was initially published in English in 1952.

The building that houses the museum was originally slated to be demolished, but a public relations campaign saved it from the wrecker's ball. Refurbished in 1999 and reopened by Queen Beatrix of the Netherlands, Anne Frank House, with its exhibition space, bookshop and cafe, is a poignant testament to a sensitive and lively young woman whose life was tragically cut short.

We never lose sleep over our Romspen investment.

For over 40 years we ran a successful commercial photography studio in Toronto. We made a good living but we soon realized an adequate retirement income would be up to us. Our long association with Romspen began with syndicated real estate mortgages. When the company was converted to a Fund we were among its first supporters. Our experience with our Romspen investments has been exceptional, even during the recent financial downturn. The Fund is one investment we never lose any sleep over and it has provided us with an extremely comfortable retirement. Thank you, Romspen.

A candle of God is the soul of man

By RABBI TZVI HERSH WEINREB

Guest Voice

I was visiting an Israeli artist colony where various types of paintings were on exhibit. In the corner were postcard-sized miniatures. In every painting, a candle predominated.

The artist was obsessed with the image of the candle. Somehow, each candle evoked the picture of a person.

The memory of the candles bedecking his workroom walls has remained with me. As long as I can remember, I have been fascinated by candles and their human-like quality. In my early teens, I was taught to meditate in front of a burning candle and to associate my meditation with the biblical phrase, "A candle of God is the soul of man."

"What are some ways that human beings resemble candles?" This question was assigned to us by the old rabbi who was my first spiritual guide. It was our task to gaze at a burning candle and imagine the affinities between candles and men. At the end of the month, we were to report on our findings. I never returned at the end of that month. Without that closure, it is no wonder that I still reflect, 50 years later, on the resemblances between people and candles.

This week's Torah portion speaks of the candles that Aaron lit in the ancient Tabernacle. The Bible speaks not of the "lighting of" the candles, but of the "raising up" of the candles. The commentaries point out that it is not sufficient to kindle the candle – one must see to it that the flame will continue to burn on its own.

The candle thus becomes a metaphor for the teaching process. It is never sufficient to merely touch the child with the flame of knowledge. One must "raise up" the flame so that it will grow and nurture the student for a long time. The task is to ensure that the flame will continue to burn on its own, that acquiring knowledge will be a lifetime process.

Another traditional Jewish saying that inspires me is: "A little bit of light can dispel much darkness." The little candle teaches us how much good a single person, or even a single act, can accomplish. If all one can do is light a match, that act can achieve unforeseen illumination.

Finally, there is a talmudic dictum, "A candle for one is a candle for 100." There are certain things in life – an item of food, for example – that can only meet the needs of one person. But one candle can benefit the single individual who needs illumination, and it can shed equal illumination for many others in the room.

And so it is in the human realm. There are things we can do that will benefit not only a single other, but an entire community, an entire world. If we teach lessons that are useful practically and spiritually uplifting, those lessons can benefit many unseen others in addition to the one being taught.

Candlelighting symbolizes the teaching process – a single act can have massive consequences.

The opening verses in this week's Torah portion render the candle image so central to the Tabernacle and Temple service because the Torah wishes us to think about the candle, to meditate on it, and to discover for ourselves the manifold analogies that lie embedded in the candle image.

"Behold the candle," the Torah exclaims. It is one of the oldest, and certainly one of the simplest, human tools. But it can be a metaphor for the power and the potential of the human soul, which is no less than the candle of God.

Is the Internet kosher?

Jewish & Digital
By Mark Mietkiewicz

Is the Internet kosher? That question has concerned many people who are worried about the ease with which the Internet can expose users to pornography, of course, but also to scenes of violence, unbridled gossip, or to just be a temptation to waste precious time. Over the years, different solutions have been proposed.

A 1999 article in Ha'aretz reported on a ban on Internet use by the haredi Orthodox Council of Torah Sages, which said the Internet threat "puts the future generations of Israel in grave danger in a way that no other threat has since Israel became a nation." For professionals who are dependent on the Internet for their livelihood, the council imposed the obligation "to seek every possible way to reduce usage," and then only to use it at the workplace. [http:// bit.ly/jweb01]

Apprehension of the web is not limited to Israel. In 2005, the Cleveland Jewish News wrote about the school Mosdos Ohr HaTorah, which required parents to sign a guarantee that they have no home access to the Internet. "We feel that the filth the Internet has is just a click away, and it is against what we stand for," says Rabbi Shmuel Berkovicz, the school's Hebrew principal. "Therefore, we ask parents to pledge that their children will never be on the Internet." [http://bit.ly/jweb14]

Opponents of the Internet would not be comforted by the results of a 2007 survey of Israeli youths.

- 24 per cent said that they had a face-to-face meeting with a stranger they met online.
- 60 per cent have visited pornographic websites, the majority said accidentally.
- 35 per cent had seen violent images.
- 19 per cent report they were accidentally exposed to websites advocating hate crimes. [http://bit.ly/jweb03]

Over the years, solutions about what to do about the web have become more nuanced. In a 2007 talk titled How Open Is Too Open? Halachic Guidelines For Internet Use, Rabbi Hershel Schachter does not minimize the risks but feels that simply saying "don't!" doesn't realistically address the problem. He warns that an outright ban of Internet in the home can create a temptation to surreptitiously seek access elsewhere. Rabbi Schachter recommends placing the computer in a public area in the house so that use – by children and adults – can be monitored. [http://bit.ly/jweb15]

What else can you do to protect yourself and your family? Suggestions range from better communication to the use of technological controls.

- Speak to your children about safe surfing and agree on rules for online safety. [http:// bit.ly/jweb16]
- Follow advice found at U.S. Department of Justice's Parent's Guide to Children's Online Safety. [http://bit.ly/jweb17]
- Install software that regulates or monitors Internet use. [http://bit.ly/jweb18]

Commercial services such as thejnet.com and Yeshivanet.com provide limited access to the web.

So far we have been talking about kosher surfing, but what about running a website? Back in 2000, Wired.com carried the article, Ban the Web? Not Lubavitch Jews. In it, Rabbi Zalman Shmotkin said he was sympathetic to concerns about the Internet. At the same time, Chabad has been a pioneer in setting up sites about Jewish learning, holidays and explaining its own philosophy. "It's not the medium itself that is kosher or not kosher. It's how it is utilized," he said. [http://bit.ly/jweb20]

In the World Wide Web's prehistoric years (circa 1996), I came across an "unofficial" English-language website for a chassidic sect, which I would have assumed would want nothing to do with the Internet. This piqued my curiosity, so I spent some time looking through the site and its entries about the group's chassidic dynasty, its saintly leaders and good works. I then came across a sole page in Yiddish – with no pictures or graphics – that presented a different message. It said: "If you can understand this, you shouldn't be here."

AEPi Ottawa has new president

On Campus
By Justin Dahan

Exams are over and the majority of students are focused on finding summer jobs so they can afford to pay for school next year. As for Robert Rinkoff, he is focusing on Alpha Epsilon Pi (AEPi).

AEPi is the Jewish fraternity for students across Canada. In Ottawa, the chapter consists of students from the University of Ottawa, Carleton University and Algonquin College. Rinkoff is the new president of the chapter. He replaces Jason Friedman, who headed AEPi in the 2010-11 school year.

Rinkoff is excited about the opportunity to help grow AEPi in Ottawa, both on campus and in the Jewish community. He spoke to me about the importance of keeping a strong connection with the Jewish community.

"As the only growing Jewish fraternity in Ottawa, I believe that it is essential that we incorporate ourselves with the community, as well as many Jewish philanthropy events, so we get the Jewish people that are in need what they need," he said. "With that being said, I will be working very close with our philanthropy chair and national [AEPi] to see what and when we can do."

Philanthropy has always been a major concern for the Ottawa chapter of AEPi. It has set up various blood drives and helped to raise money for cardiac research, among other events. Rinkoff hopes to continue these events, as well as add others, for the upcoming year.

When Friedman was president of AEPi, he helped to build strong ties with other organizations in the Jewish community. Rinkoff hopes to continue this and build on it. "In continuing to build a stronger relationship with Chabad and Hillel, we can have a greater effect on campus," he said. "I believe that we have a great bond with both of them currently. I just want to make sure it's only going to get better.

"We have members on each of their boards, so we are able to communicate easier about events that each are going to be hosting and support them. Also IAC [Israel Awareness Committee] is growing, and we will be there for them on any occasion that is needed."

The current president of the IAC, Mark Klibanov, has an executive position with AEPi. This helps AEPi to have an instant partnership with IAC and allows for both organizations to support each other.

Rinkoff makes one thing clear. "Where I want to see Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity this year is making sure that the Jewish community knows we are there for anything that they need us to be and as well make sure our presence is out there, and make sure that people know AEPi is here to stay and grow even larger [and] to make sure the Jewish community is recognized and seen in a positive light," he said.

With clear goals set for the upcoming year and early preparation for September, AEPi and Rinkoff are poised to have a great year to grow in the Jewish community. Considering the past attacks on Klibanov and his roommate, Nick Bergamini, who was part of the Carleton Student Organization and an avid Israel supporter, and the annual nature of Israeli Apartheid Week, we need AEPi and IAC to stay strong and play a big role.

Torah 2.0

Class Act
By Daniel Held

The Internet, like most media, began as a unidirectional source of information. One could design a website, publish it online and millions of people could access and read the content.

Web 2.0 transformed the Internet from a monologue into a dialogue. Sites such as Wikipedia, Twitter and Facebook changed the direction of the flow of information by allowing users to interact with one another, rather than exclusively with the site author. Through collaboration and information-sharing, users generate not only the content but also the manner in which it's shared.

All too often, our teaching of Torah is stuck in the world of web 1.0. We read a text, learn the Rashi and commentaries, and move along. I remember all too well tests in elementary school asking me to regurgitate a commentary's question and answer without reflecting on its meaning or significance. Excellence in teaching Torah is achieved only when the learner and teacher are in dialogue with the text and commentaries.

Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik, in his work And From There You Shall Seek, offers a beautiful description of this dialogue across the generations.

"When I sit down to learn Torah, I find myself immediately in the company of the sages of the masorah. The relations between us are personal. The Rambam is at my right, Rabbeinu Tam at my left, Rashi sits up front and interprets, Rabbenu Tam disputes him; the Rambam issues a ruling, and the Rabad objects. They are all in my little room, sitting around my table. They look at me affectionately, enjoy arguing and studying the Talmud with me, encourage and support me."

For the last few months, the Jewish Publications Society has been beta testing the Tagged Tanach, and in celebration of Shavuot, the anniversary of the giving of the Torah, JPS is launching the full version of the website at www.taggedtanakh.org.

The Tagged Tanach brings Rabbi Soloveitchik's style of learning to life. Using web 2.0 technologies, it empowers users to write their own commentaries on the Torah, read those of others and create a dialogue. While sitting in front of a computer screen, to the left can be a Torah scholar from Israel, to the right a high school student from France, and behind a college student from New York. Through the website, one can interact with thousands of other learners, learn from their insights and challenge their commentaries.

The system isn't perfect. The Tagged Tanach doesn't bring classical commentaries into the dialogue, uses only the JPS translation as its base text, and, still in its infancy, lacks the critical mass of users to truly shape the web 2.0 nature of the endeavour. Over the course of time, and as the number of users grow, each of these challenges can be addressed.

What the Tagged Tanach does do is empower the user with a commentator's voice. The learner in the Tagged Tanach can find his own links between the Torah and his world, finding new connections between the text and the modern context. The system also encourages dialogue, questioning and personalization. As web 2.0 did for the Internet, it changes the direction of the flow from unidirectional to conversational, and transforms a passive learner into a teacher and commentator.

Rabbi Soloveitchik concludes his story by writing: "Torah study is not solely an educational activity. It is not a merely formal, technical matter embodied in the discovery and exchange of facts. It is a powerful experience of becoming friends with many generations of Torah scholars, the joining of one spirit with another, the union of souls. Those who transmitted the Torah and those who received it come together in one historical way-station."

If all of our Torah study followed the model of Rabbi Soloveitchik and the Tagged Tanach, we would find ourselves immersed in a far richer world of Torah scholars.

The New Israel Fund claims to love Israel, but gives millions of dollars to groups that delegitimize it.

NIF CLAIMS :

"If... [an NGO] denies Jews the right to self determination, that organization would not receive a grant from us."
- Rachel Liel, NIF-Israel Executive Director, April 2010

"We deeply disagree with the use of 'apartheid' in the Israeli context."
- Daniel Sokatch, NIF CEO, March 2010

"None of our organizations appeared before the UN [Goldstone] commission." - Rachel Liel, April 2010

"NIF opposes the BDS movement... [and] believes these tactics to be unproductive, inflammatory and ineffective." - Daniel Sokatch, March 2010

"We...firmly oppose attempts to prosecute Israeli officials in foreign courts..." - NIF Website: FAQs

There's a line between legitimate criticism of Israel, and support for groups that delegitimize it.

But NIF FUNDS Groups :

Attempting to Erase Israel's Jewish Framework
NIF grantee Mada al-Carmel ($200,000 in 2008) calls for a "change in the definition of the State of Israel from a Jewish state," and the implementation of the Palestinian "right of return", meaning the end of Jewish self-determination.

Campaigning to Equate Israel with Apartheid
NIF grantee B'Tselem's ($357,569 in 2008) Jessica Montell: "I think the word apartheid is useful for mobilizing people because of its emotional power. In some cases, the situation in the West Bank is worse than apartheid in South Africa."

Aiding Goldstone and UN Demonization
8 NIF grantees (combined total $2.2 million in 2008) submitted a joint statement to Goldstone alleging "human rights violations for which Israel must be held accountable." Officials from one grantee, PCATI, gave anti-Israel testimony before Goldstone.

Promoting Boycotts, Divestment & Sanctions
6 NIF grantees (combined total $477,974 in 2008) successfully petitioned the Norwegian Pension Fund to divest from Israeli firms.

Helping to Prosecute Israeli Officials Abroad
NIF grantee Adalah ($510,150 in 2008) submitted a legal opinion to a Spanish court in support of a lawfare case against Israeli officials.

NIF has Crossed the Line.

Israeli PM Benjamin Netanyahu kicking off UJA's Walk with Israel

Participants urged to arrive early at Direct Energy Centre

By Daniel Horowitz

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is kicking off UJA's annual Walk with Israel on Sunday, May 30th. Prime Minister Netanyahu will be delivering a live address at the CNE Direct Energy Centre barring unforeseen circumstances.

The special kick-off event is limited to sponsored walkers and their immediate family members, and is a first-come, first-served event. While the Direct Energy Centre holds approximately 5,000 people, special rooms will be equipped with a live audio/video feed to ensure that thousands more can share in what promises to be an unforgettable experience.

Those hoping to see Prime Minister Netanyahu live are urged to arrive at the Direct Energy Centre early as registration and security checks begin at 8:00 am. Advanced on-line registration is urged prior to May 30th at walkwithisrael.com.

"Having the Prime Minister of Israel with us, in person, for our annual Walk with Israel, reinforces our connection with Israel," said Lianne Leboff who, along with husband Bruce, is back at the helm of the Walk for the second consecutive year. "As Jews in the Diaspora, this is an extraordinary opportunity to show our support for the people of Israel, and to demonstrate that support in front of Prime Minister Netanyahu is incredible."

"The presence of Benjamin Netanyahu in our community is both a privilege and an honour," said Bruce. "I strongly encourage the entire community to participate in this year's Walk with Israel, and show him just how supportive our community is of Israel and that we will stand against those who seek to demonize and marginalize Israel. This is an opportunity not to be missed."

Funds raised by the 42nd annual Walk with Israel - the largest one-day Israel solidarity walk in the Diaspora - presented by Metropia - will help Bat Yam's children, with proceeds being allocated by UJA to United Israel Appeal Canada for which authorized organizations will deliver services.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu will kick off UJA's Walk with Israel on Sunday, May 30th.

Located just south of Tel Aviv, Bat Yam has historically faced a number of challenges, including unemployment, housing conditions and the educational system. The city is also home to a large population of Ethiopian immigrants striving to integrate into Israeli society. UJA's assistance is transforming Bat Yam's educational and social situation.

The vice chairs of this year's Walk with Israel are Jonny Cole and Laurie Sheff.

"There's no better time or place than at the Walk with Israel to come out and make a statement to the world that we support the people of Israel," said Sheff. "With thousands of us flooding the streets of Toronto and waving Israeli and Canadian flags, that message simply can't be ignored."

"We have learned in the past that we are truly stronger when we stand together for a cause, or against an injustice," said Cole. "It's imperative that we, as Jews, participate in this year's Walk with Israel; a day when we, as a community, not only come together, but walk together, for and with our beloved Israel."

The Walk with Israel, which will commence following Prime Minister Netanyahu's address, ends with the RioCan Festival, at The Direct Energy Centre, and features carnival rides and games; the Spin Master Play Zone, a petting zoo; the Teen Zone with Guitar Hero; The IBI Group Israeli Art Centre; The Gluskin Sheff Kosher Barbecue, and much more.

For more information about the Walk with Israel, or to register and raise funds online visit: walkwithisrael.com or call 416.631.5700.

The PJ Library pilot project launched in York Region

UJA hopes to bring initiative to entire GTA

For a parent, some of the most unique and fulfilling moments we share come via the bedtime story.

Seeing the looks of joy, excitement and anticipation on the faces of our children as they wait for the page to turn, revealing a new and colourful illustration in their favourite book, is something neither they, nor we, will ever forget.

Now, thanks to a new pilot project - the adventure of the bedtime story has been taken to a higher level.

Dubbed The PJ Library (PJ, as in pyjamas), this award-winning outreach program to residents of York Region, chaired by Elisa Morton Palter, is designed to develop the identities of Jewish families and strengthen their relationships to the Jewish community.

Parents who reside in York Region with children ages 6 months to 5½ years are eligible to register their family for The PJ Library at www.pjlibrary905.ca or by calling 416.621.56PJ (5675). Each month, the families will receive in the mail, free of charge, a book or CD on Jewish themes including such time-honoured classics as Bagels for Benny and exciting new books like Howard Schwartz's Before You Were Born.

Started in 2005 by the Harold Grinspoon Foundation, The PJ Library is already a success in Calgary, Montreal, Vancouver and Winnipeg, and is active in more than 125 American communities, bringing Jewish-themed children's books and music to young Jewish families. But the books and CDs are only the beginning. Through innovative programming, The PJ Library in York Region will offer participants programs as a way to connect them with other young families to create a true sense of community.

"Throughout my volunteer and philanthropic career, I have primarily focused on issues concerning either education, or reaching out to our community's unaffiliated," says Morton Palter. "If you combine that focus with my voracious appetite for reading (I keep Chapters in business!) and my business background in publishing, involvement with The PJ Library seemed like the perfect situation. The opportunity to use all elements of my background to engage unaffiliated, under-affiliated and interfaith families in the Jewish community through books and family-friendly programs was simply too good for me to pass up."

Each book and CD comes with a reading guide for parents created for The PJ Library by Jewish educators and early childhood educators. The guides list other books to explore and family-friendly ways of bringing lessons and feelings engendered by the books and CDs into each home.

The PJ Library in York Region is a free, no strings attached pilot project that is made possible through the generous support of Gabi Weisfeld, the Weinbaum Family Foundation, Phyllis and Ab Flatt, the Community Fund of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. UJA is committed to seeking funding so that the program can expand across the entire Greater Toronto Area.

PJ Library in York Region families will receive Jewish themed children's books, music and innovative programming, connecting them to the Jewish community.

Speakers encourage unity among faiths

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Canadians should accept different cultures in society while standing together as one people, said Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl at the 24th annual Neighbourhood Interfaith Dinner.

"We must learn to accommodate and recognize distinctiveness [in our society]" he said at the dinner, held on May 6 at Temple Sinai.

"The world has much to learn from the biblical affirmation of being created in the image of God, which gives universal dignity to all," he said. " We have to cultivate the dignity of difference, where each of us walks in the path of our particular covenant of faith while we also seek ways to march together."

The interfaith dinner, which is chaired by Bryan Beauchamp, brings together members of the Jewish, Christian and Muslim communities and aims to open up a dialogue between the communities. Keynote speakers alternate each year to include all three faiths, with the first imam speaking in 2008.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

In his address, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl questioned how far a society should go to accommodate different religions and cultures, such as in allowing or prohibiting head covers.

"It seems to me that if [head covers] are prohibited, so would a ski mask in winter," he said. "Perhaps a reasonable accommodation might be to decide what activities absolutely require positive identification and mandate that only in those circumstances wouldlimited facial exposure be required."

The rabbi also focused on the moral similarities each religion shares.

"Duty, obligation, sympathy, solidarity, these we share by virtue of our humanity," he said.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl spoke alongside Toronto Centre MP Bob Rae, who stressed the importance of connecting as a community.

Bob Rae

"I think perhaps, generations ago, we would not have understood how much we are connected. [Now] we can't turn around and say there is any corner of the globe that is alien to us," he said. "We can't say that the devastation which is occurring in the eastern Congo… where over the last 20 years, we estimate that 20 million people have been killed. We can't say that's far away anymore."

Rae went on to speak about the United Nations 'millennium development goals, which include ending poverty, universal education and combating HIV/AIDS.

"The millennium goals… are not complicated. First of all, we want mothers to be able to give birth to children without dying. We want children to be able to grow up without dying. We want to be able to eliminate the big diseases in the world that are killing people at a great rate," he said, adding housing and climate change to his list.

"And in every one of these instances, religious faith has something to tell us," he said.

"We also have to recognize that unless people of different religions can actually talk to one another – religious faith itself has been a source of great conflict," he said. During his talk, Rae emphasized the importance of events such as the interfaith dinner.

"I suspect when it first started, people lived next door to each other and didn't really understand – what is it you do on Saturdays and what is it we do on Sundays?" he said.

"The greatest thing we have in this country… is that we have learned to look into the eyes of the other and see something of ourselves, and we know that's the key to being able to live in peace."

Ukrainians, Jews unite to identify righteous gentiles

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A project to identify and recognize Ukrainian Christians who assisted Jews during the Holocaust has been launched by Canadian and Ukrainian organizations.

The project is a joint venture between the Ukrainian Canadian Research and Documentation Centre (UCRDC) in Toronto and the Ukrainian Jewish Encounter Initiative and the Judaica Institute in Kiev, the capital of Ukraine.

Started by Leonid Finberg of the Judaica Institute, the project has the support of the Ukrainian Jewish Encounter Initiative, a privately organized, multinational group whose goal is to deepen scholarly and broader public interest in the complexity of Ukrainian-Jewish relations.

The UCRDC, founded in 1983, is a non-profit, non-governmental community organization that collects, catalogues and preserves material documenting Ukrainian history.

The Ukrainian government has no involvement, either in funding, planning or implementing the project, said Orest Zakydalsky, a researcher affiliated with UCRDC.

Zakydalsky said the Judaica Institute will conduct research in Europe and elsewhere, while the UCRDC will be responsible for collecting more material on Ukrainian-Jewish relations during WoHld War II. The UCRDC has been amassing material on this topic for many years.

"The primary goal is to collect eyewitness oral history testimony about Christian Ukrainians who helped save or hide Jewish Ukrainians," said Zakydalsky, a graduate of the University of Toronto's Centre for European, Russian and Eurasian Studies.

He added, "While there is a lot of information on Ukraine at both Yad Vashem and the Shoah Foundation in Los Angeles, our goal is to look through this information, systematize it and supplement it with new material. It is strictly an academic, non-governmental project."

Orest Zakydalsky, centre, is seen with fellow researchers Raya Shadursky, left, of the Kiev-based Ukrainian Jewish Encounter Initiative and Iroida Wynnyckyj, right, the project co-ordinator of the Ukrainian Canadian Research and Documentation Centre in Toronto.

Of Ukraine's prewar population of 1.5 million Jews, 900,000 to one million perished in the Holocaust. Currently, 103,000 to 200,000 Jews live in Ukraine.

According to Zakydalsky, Yad Vashem has conferred the title of Righteous Among Nations on more than 2,000 Ukrainian Christians who helped Jews during the Holocaust.

"In this respect, Ukraine is fourth out of 33 countries," said Zakydalsky. "However, since a large part of what is now Ukraine was under Polish rule until 1939, and other parts of Ukraine were occupied by Hungary and Romania during World War II, many Ukrainians are actually listed as Righteous Among the Nations under Poland or other misleading labels."

Of Ukrainians who have not been formally recognized as Righteous Gentiles, the most prominent is Metropolitan Andrey Sheptycky, the primate of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church during the Nazi occupation, said Zakydalsky.

His name notwithstanding, there are no precise figures as to the number of Ukrainian Righteous Gentiles who haven't received formal recognition from Yad Vashem.

"But recently, we have taken our project to the Ukrainian community and have had quite a bit of feedback from people who want to share information about this topic," Zakydalsky said. "We are in the process of speaking with these people and documenting and reviewing their testimony."

Zakydalsky said it is important to recognize the heroism of Ukrainian Righteous Gentiles in order to honour them and show that there were positive relations between Ukrainians and Jews, even during "a period of deep crisis and pervasive violence."

The UCRDC will focus on identifying and documenting cases that have a Canadian connection, said Zakydalsky.

In an appeal to Jews and Christians of Ukrainian ancestry, he asked members of both communities to provide information that might be helpful in finding Ukrainians who may have saved Jews during this era.

The degree to which Ukrainians collaborated with the Nazis is a complex subject, since the former Soviet Union demonized Ukrainians who opposed Soviet power, Zakydalsky said.

Orthodox girls' school turns 10

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Orthodox girls' high school Tiferes Bais Yaakov celebrated its 10-year anniversary this year at a ceremony earlier this month by honouring the people who built the school.

Hersch Kanner was one of the people who received an award at the May 10 celebration, for his role as a founder of the school, though he continues his involvement in the daily operations. He also helped in physically building the school's current on Stormont Avenue and former locations.

He said he got involved when he tried to find a high school for his youngest daughter, explaining he wanted a school that focused on individual attention and self-growth.

The school began 10 years ago with 19 students, and the upcoming 2010-11 school year will have more than 170, said Simi Grosman, president of the board of the directors for the school.

"It shows that our vision was correct, and that our concept of what education should be was accepted by the community much more quickly than we ever would have imagined," said Rabbi Yitzchak Feigenbaum, principal of the school.

His students and co-workers describe him as the soul of the school, and a passionate man with a special talent in bringing the lessons beyond academia and into the realm of personal growth.

"He has a very key understanding of the needs and the strengths and weaknesses of each girl, and plays on that to achieve the best possible outcome," Kanner said.

Rabbi Feigenbaum said the school aims to give the girls an intellectually challenging but honest program, teaching them a combination of Jewish and secular studies, so that they can find their talents and eventually give back to their community.

Students who spoke to The CJN at the anniversary celebration demonstrated their understanding of Rabbi Feigenbaum's goals.

Chaviva Posner, from the graduating class of 2007, said: "Our principal's motto that he would say all the time is, 'You're not a grade on a piece of paper. You're not a hairstyle. You are the moral decisions that you make.'

"I think that really encompasses the values that we learned," she added.

Grosman said most of the Tiferes Bais Yaakov students spend at least a year in Israel after high school. From there, they take many different paths, such as continuing with their education at a university level or pursuing careers such as teaching.

Rabbi Aharon Hersh Fried, a professor at Yeshiva University's Stern College for Women and the guest speaker for the evening, said Tiferes Bais Yaakov's success is due to its authenticity.

"Many schools go through the motions, but chinuch [education] has got to reach the heart," he said.

His primary message was that children should be taught to avoid accepting knowledge simply because it came from a credible source, but to question everything.

"Teach them to think," Rabbi Fried emphasized, describing an event at which he spoke with a group of illiterate people who couldn't solve logic problems in their heads but ony understood what they could see.

It is these kinds of experiences that reinforced his understanding of the necessity of learning, he said.

It is only through education, he added, that children can learn to truly understand.

Speaking at Tiferes Bais Yaakov's anniversary celebration, Rabbi Aharon Hersh Fried said, "Teach them to think."

Canada and Israel: 60 years of friendship

By MIRIAM ZIV

Canada and Israel share a deep friendship based on common interest, shared values and mutual trust. As ambassador of Israel to Canada, I have the unique opportunity of seeing this special friendship at work every day.

Guest Voice

Our shared journey began in 1947, when Canada played a central role in the drafting of the UN Partition Plan and voted in favour of establishing a state for the Jewish People in their national homeland. From the outset, it was apparent that common values provided the foundation for the fledgling friendship – it was Canada's strong commitment to democracy, the rule of law and human rights that led it to support Israel's creation.

Six decades later, the two countries enjoy a friendship that is marked by close economic, social, cultural and political ties.

Since the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement was implemented in 1996, trade between the two countries has tripled. Programs like the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation have resulted in extensive technical and commercial exchanges between the two countries and have led to lucrative breakthroughs in many sectors, including software development, waste management, biotechnology and medical research. Different projects have also been initiated to strengthen ties between Israel and the provinces. Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty's visit to Israel this week is a case in point.

Relations have been reinforced by collaboration in a variety of other fields, including social security, public safety, telecommunications and international aid. Canada and Israel have also embarked on significant joint legal ventures, resulting in a close relationship between our two supreme courts.

The last 60 years have also witnessed numerous cultural and academic exchanges between the two countries. Influences of Israeli art, dance and literature can be readily seen in Canada and vice versa. The convergence of our cultures has played an important role in bringing Canada and Israel even closer.

As ambassador, I have been a first-hand witness to the benefits of this co-operation and was eager to celebrate the 60th anniversary of Canada-Israel relations in an important way. The launch of the Canada-Israel joint commemorative stamp last April was the perfect culmination of this celebration. Thanks to the devotion and enthusiasm of all those involved in this project, Canadians and Israelis can proudly enjoy this stamp as an everlasting symbol of the deep friendship between our countries and our peoples.

Relations have been reinforced by collaboration in a variety of fields, including social security, public safety, telecommunications and international aid

Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chretien and accompanying RCMP officer lay a wreath at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem in 2000.

While the relationship fostered between Canada and Israel over the last 60 years will continue to bear many fruits, its foundation runs far deeper than economic and cultural agreements. As countries strongly dedicated to human rights and democracy, Canada and Israel found a strong ally in each other from the start. Canada has firmly supported Israel's right to live in peace and security, while Israel has always welcomed Canada's involvement in the Middle East.

In just a few days, Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu will be meeting with Prime Minister Stephen Harper in Ottawa. This visit is an opportunity for Netanyahu to express his gratitude and appreciation for the government of Canada's unwavering support. Israel will not forget that Canada was the first country to pull out of the 2009 anti-Semitic Durban II Conference, nor will it forget that Canada has often stood alone in voting against UN Human Rights Council resolutions that have singled Israel out time and time again. Canada was also vocal in expressing its condemnation of the deeply flawed Goldstone report on the war in Gaza.

In spite of the changing dynamics of international politics over the last decade, Canada has proven its friendship to Israel and has demonstrated that the power of common values and ethics transcend the transient pressures in the international arena. Ultimately, it is these shared values that guarantee that Canada's close friendship with Israel will continue to flourish.

Miriam Ziv is Israel's ambassador to Canada.

Portraits of a relationship

From the earliest days of Canada's relations with Israel, Canada demonstrated an understanding for the fundamental issues underlying Israel's conflict with the surrounding Arab states and with the Palestinians. The following is a statement by Lester Pearson in the House of Commons on Jan. 24, 1956:

"It seems to me that an essential, indeed, a first requirement, is that the Arab states should recognize the legitimate and permanent existence of the State of Israel. That, as I see it, necessitates abandonment by them of the impractical stipulation that we must return to the United Nations resolutions of 1947, which provided for a divided Palestine. The Arab states took up arms to prevent these resolutions becoming effective, and I do not see how they can claim the right to have them accepted now as the price of peace in that area. The people of Israel have the right to know that their national existence is not at stake. That seems to me to be fundamental. Efforts to bring peace and all its benefits to the Middle East will be of no avail unless Israel and the people of Israel are released from the overhanging fear which naturally envelopes the country as a result of the threats of destruction and of the political and economic warfare directed against it by its neighbours. Deep fear leads to desperate acts which, though they cannot be condoned, may at least be understood. Surely it is essential, therefore, that this basic cause of fear must be removed if there is to be a solution of the Arab-Israel dispute."

Canada - Israel 60 Years

Canada readies itself for Netanyahu

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

On Monday May 31, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu will visit Ottawa to meet with Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper and other officials.

In a statement of welcome earlier this month, Harper said he looked forward to the visit and that it would "further strengthen" the bonds between the two nations.

Netanyahu will be the first sitting Israeli prime minister to visit the country since Yitzhak Rabin in 1994.

A planned speech by Netanyahu, then Israel's former prime minister, in 2002 at Concordia University in Montreal was cancelled after students protesting the speech held a protest that turned violent.

Canada and Israel have a 61-year history of bilateral relations – formal diplomatic relations were established on May 11, 1949 – and the ties between the two countries have grown tighter since the Harper government came to power in 2006.

Speaking to The CJN last week, Peter Kent, minister of state of foreign affairs (Americas) and MP for Thornhill, reflected on the relationship and what it has meant to Canadians.

Peter Kent

"We haven't been blessed with all that many [Israeli] prime ministerial visits over the years, but this meeting is going to reinforce and highlight for Canadians the many dimensions of our relationship," he said, adding that the meeting would not solely focus on subjects such as "foreign policy and the defence of Israel's right to exist [but] also the cross-pollination of our people… the Israeli Diaspora and the Jewish people in Canada, and the significant number of Canadians who live in Israel."

The government estimates that approximately 20,000 Canadians now live in Israel.

Kent said he hoped Netanyahu's visit would also serve to remind Canadians of Israel's diverse contributions to the world.

"On my visits to Israel, I'm always reminded of the things that aren't covered often by Canadian media, such as the country's arts, sciences, academia, archeology. There are great things happening in Israel in terms of technology transfer and development," he said.

Kent cited the success of the countries' "mutually beneficial free trade agreement" – referring to the Canada–Israel Free Trade Agreement (CIFTA) signed in 1996.

Bob Rae

Since the implementation of CIFTA, bilateral trade between the countries has more than tripled – from $507.3 million in 1996 to a high of $1.8 billion in 2008, according to the Canadian government's latest figures.

Additionally, Kent said Canada views Netanyahu's visit as coming at a "critical time" in the Middle East peace process.

"[Canada] recognizes the continuing threats from groups and countries which remain committed – either through their specific pronouncements or actions – to the elimination of the state of Israel or of a Jewish presence in the Middle East," he said.

"Canada has made its position very clear on this, but we also have to be encouraging and reassuring to the citizens of the Palestinian Authority that we support their aspirations for viable coexistence and peace."

For its part, the Liberal party views the six-decade relationship in a similar vein.

Toronto Centre MP Bob Rae said he believes the ties between Canada and Israel transcend partisan differences.

"It's a relationship shared by the whole country, not just one political party, particularly in the context where the [Conservative] government is trying to appropriate the entire relationship," he said.

Rae said the links between Israel and Canada go back to Ivan Rand – the Canadian Supreme Court justice who was the country's appointee to the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine following World War II and who would later support the UN's partition plan for Palestine and the creation of Israel.

Despite "moments of political difference" over the years, Rae said that, overall, Canada's relationship with Israel has always remained very strong.

"Canadians of all backgrounds have deeply appreciated the ties with Israel," he said, adding that trade, research and academic relations between the countries continue to grow.

He said the Liberals take pride in the relationship, and that to his knowledge, members of all federal parties "have good political ties" with Israeli politicians. "We talk to them on a regular basis."

Rae noted that he's scheduled to be honoured by University of Haifa later this year.

"Our ties are very, very deep and profound. And that's something that members of the Jewish community should be proud of."

With regard to Netanyahu's visit and schedule, Rae said although he wasn't privy to the Israeli prime minister's agenda, because his party has always had "good access" to Israeli dignitaries, he assumed that Liberal Leader Michael Ignatieff would end up meeting with him at some point during his stay.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

"נשמת הקהילה"

"נשמת הקהילה" (Spirit of the Cummunity) הוא לדעתי האירוע הקהילתי מספר אחד של הישראלים במורנוטו. יש כאן הופעות רבות מישראל, יש תיאטרון קהילתי, כולם מתייצבים ביום הזכרון, אבל יש רק רב אחד וקהילה אחת שדואגים ללא תנאים מוקדמים לצרכי הדת והמסורת של הקהילה שלנו. לרב לנדא וקהילתו, שחרשו על דגלם "אהבת חינם", בקהילה שיש בה כל כך הרבה שנאת חינם, מגיע שנבוא בהרכב מלא לערב השנתי בשני בינואר.

וכדי להראות עד כמה האירוע הזה לגיטימי ונכון- את פרס "יקיר הקהילה" יקבל השנה פרופ. דני פארין, הנוירולוג והמיילד, שאחראי להולדתם בשלום של מאות רבות של תינוקות ישראלים ואלפי תינוקות יהודיים במורנוטו.

דני, איש צנוע שעושה לילות ארוכים ב"מאנט סיני" להבטיח את שלומן של היולדות וילדיהן- לא חשב שמגיע לו על כך פרס, אבל הרב לנדא כבר אחרת, ושוב שכך.

בנוסף להיותו רופא עם מוניטין בינלאומי, פרופ. פארין הוא גם תורם, מדען ומורה מעולה. ואולי החשוב מכל- בן אדם, אדם, אדם. או "מענטש", כמו שאומרת אמא שלי.

אני מזמין אתכם להצטרף אל המאות שבאים לגעת בנשמת הקהילה שלנו. 9157097770 spiritdinner@gmail.com

מה יהיה

בעוד כל אוהדי ישראל טרודים מאוד ממצבה הפוליטי והמדיני, בשקט בשקט השיגה ישראל כמתנת יום הולדת ששית ושתים עשרת הישגים כלכליים שנראו בעבר דמיוניים ובלתי מושגים.

בשנה האחרונה עלתה רמת החיים בישראל בשבעה אחוזים, הרבה יותר מכל מדינות העולם המפותח. בימים אלה ממש עבר התוצר הגולמי הישראלי בפעם הראשונה בהיסטוריה את שלושים אלף הדולאר בשנה, ושם את ישראל ברמה של בריטניה והרבה לפני מדינות רבות באירופה. נכון שחלק מזה הוא תוצאה של נפילת הדולאר לעומת מטבעות אחרים, אבל חלק שני מכובד הוא הישג כלכלי ישראלי אמיתי.

בניגוד לאירה"ב ובריטניה-לא עברה ישראל את משבר בועת הנדל"ן והבנקאות, דבר שהגדיל משמעותית את הערכת העולם המפותח לכלכלה הישראלית.

וממש ממש לידם ההולדת התקבלה ישראל כחברה ה 32 בארגון לשיתוף פעולה כלכלי (OCED- Economic Cooperation and Development) שהיא תשדיל כבוד חסרת תקדים.

זה אומר שבעוד שכל טרוריסט שילמי חולם על איך לפגוע בישראל, וידב של מדינות העולם רואים בנו קרן מסריד- הישראלי עובד קשה ובשקט- בקו היצור, בהיי טק, בתעשיות הבטחוניות, ביצוא לכל העולם. וגם אלה שאוהבים להשמיץ את ההנהגה בישראל חייבים להודות שיש לממשלות האחרונות תפקיד מכריע בכוון הנכון. אבל שישאר בינינו.

לראות את היופי

תודה לגלית על הקטע הבא:

לא פעם יצא לי לראות אמן רחוב מבגן בצורה מפליאה, וחשבתי לעצמי שהוא-היא יכלו לבגן בכל תזמורת סימפונית. עכשיו עשו בדיוק תרגיל הפוך:ג'רשוע בל, אחד הכוכבים המובים בעולם עמד בתחנת רכבת ובגן שש יצירות של באך במשך 45 דקות. כאלפיים איש עברו לידו בדרכם לעבודה. מעטים בלבד האטו את צעדיהם, ובימו המשיכו.

והמסקנה:כמעט הכל תלוי בקונטקסט, בנסיבות. אם אין לנו רגע אחד כדי לעצור ולהקשיב למוזיקאי הגדול בעולם, מבגן את היצירות הטובות ביותר שנכתבו אי פעם, עם כינור ששווה מליוני דולארים-כמה דברים אחרים אנחנו מפספסים במרוץ החיים?

אבל שישאר בינינו.

Greater Toronto Area

Art teacher believes everyone has creativity

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

As an art and computer teacher at an Orthodox girls' high school, Shayne Hyman Train has to be creative – not just because of the content of her courses, but to meet Ontario's educational guidelines without breaching the school's standards of Halachah (Jewish law).

Train – who earlier this month received a general studies teacher award from Tiferes Bais Yaakov, where she has been teaching for six years – steers clear of art textbooks, for example, favouring handouts instead.

Art texts tend to contain nudity or avodah zarah (idolatry), she explained in an interview in her classroom, where long tables are covered with paint-spattered plastic. Colourful artwork – as well as a message from a student, proclaiming "We (heart) Mrs. Train!" – adorns the walls.

"There are some restrictions," she acknowledged, "but there's so much students can still learn about."

In addition to studying topics like Renaissance art and impressionism, Train – who teaches Grade 10 computers and Grades 9, 11 and 12 art – said she wants her students "to see that they are creative, because I believe everybody has creativity within them."

She wants them to have fun too.

A lesson from the teacher: "People should be lifelong learners, and not just in the classroom. But I realize also it's not just about the learning. It's sharing what you learn... There's a lot of times when we'll sit around. [Students] are working, but we'll also shmooze about different topics."

Outside of school, Train enjoys playing piano in a klezmer band, The Shpeelers. Her husband, Leslie – a dentist who also plays bagpipes and reads Torah – is in the band too, on the saxophone and clarinet.

"My family is very renaissance and eclectic," said Train, a mother of four. She noted the influence of her parents: Ruth Hyman became a nursery school teacher when her children were in school, and Train's father Gurion Hyman, a pharmacist, also went back to school, earning a master's degree in Aramaic, and later teaching Yiddish at the University of Toronto.

Train, 55, who grew up "Conservadox" and attended United Synagogue Day School (now Robbins Hebrew Academy), became more Orthodox when she got married, she said.

An active member of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, she has served as the shul's acting youth director and taken on various volunteer roles. But joining the school six years ago was "another step," she said. "Now I cover my hair, and I don't wear pants."

As well, she said, being at the school – and seeing the respect and kindness shown by her students – has changed her thinking in some ways. Once, she said, a girl ran into a computer class to ask her classmates to "drop everything" to pray for someone who was ill. "That was really, really nice," Train recalls. "It was a bit of a realignment in the way I thought about education."

Train received her bachelor of arts in 1977 and her bachelor of education in 1978, both from the University of Toronto. As well, she has qualifications in special education from York University, a diploma in computer programming from Humber College, and has completed more than half a dozen computer-related programs including advanced web design.

But after she graduated as a teacher, she recalls, she didn't feel ready to actually teach. "I was so young."

Instead, she worked in advertising, spent a year in Israel living on a kibbutz, and then decided to go into the computer field.

"I was thinking it could be used for educational purposes," she said. But, she added, virtually no one was doing that type of work at the time.

In the classroom, she noted, her students have a variety of learning styles, and she's convinced that she has "learning differences" herself.

"I don't like to take that as an excuse. If something's not working, you approach it differently." In fact, she noted, the visual and auditory components of computers can be just the type of approaches that make a difference.

Overall, Train believes that, as a teacher, it is important to stay positive. "Instead of saying what [students] did wrong, I say, 'Here's what you might want to try next time.' "

Train's enthusiasm for her work is evident. "I really love what I do," she said.

The Economist finds the right balance

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

This column has recently criticized major elements of the mainstream media for failing to deal adequately with the complexity of the Middle East "peace process" by, foremost, placing all or nearly all of the onus for progress on Israel while ignoring the responsibilities on the Palestinian side.

Some exceptions to this pattern, however, have come from unusual quarters. Take, for instance, the influential magazine. In an editorial in its May 11 issue, while asserting the well-known expectations of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu concerning (then) pending indirect or "proximity" negotiations, the publication also turned its attention to certain, rarely heard, expectations of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

Referring to an interview Abbas gave on Israeli TV (Channel 2 on Apr. 25), the Economist noted that he spoke directly to the Israeli public and "conceded" that, with respect to borders, one of the final status issues, he is willing to consider land swaps instead of insisting on what is a deal-breaker for Israel – a return precisely to the Green Line, the 1949 armistice line with Jordan (which, in any event, was never an official border, although it is often incorrectly discribed as such).

Regarding a land swap, the Economist wrote that in the highly charged issue of Jerusalem, for instance, "some of the [Jewish] suburbs in what is occupied Palestinian territory could go to Israel, along with three or four of the main settlement blocks… If this were agreed to early on, it would draw much of the poison out of the recent row over [the city]."

Such swaps were reportedly on the table long ago at Camp David in 2000 – the deal that then-PA president Yasser Arafat rejected. So this is not a new idea. Yet Abbas' apparent willingness to be flexible on this matter is not insignificant. (Also not insignificant is the British magazine's willingness to term Jewish housing in east Jerusalem "suburbs" instead of, as is often the case in its pages, "settlements.")

The Economist was forthright on another deal-breaker for Israel – the longstanding insistence by the Palestinians that the refugees among them have an inherent "right of return" to Israel. Without any equivocation, the editorial argued the following: "The logic of having two states requires that Israel can be sure of keeping its large Jewish majority. Hence Mr. Abbas will have to accept that the Palestinians can have no actual right to return to the homes they lost after Israel was created in 1948."

(While the Economist wrote pointedly about what Abbas "will have to accept," it did go on to write that Israel "could acknowledge" what it called "the theoretical right of Palestinians to return" and then "accept a small symbolic number who would not alter [Israel's] demographic balance." However, as a great many Israeli and other international law experts have noted, contrary to popular misconception this "right of return" does not exist. What is feasible, and what Israeli leaders have spoken about, is accepting a small number of Palestinians on an individual, not group basis, as part of its long-standing humanitarian "family reunification" policy. But what would also have to be discussed is the wholly overlooked matter of compensating the hundreds of thousands of Jewish refugees who were evicted or had to flee from Arab countries around the time of Israel's establishment.)

While Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Salam Fayyad recently signalled, in an interview in Ha'aretz on April 2, that the Palestinians would have to confine a return of refugees to a Palestinian state (a position for which he encountered stinging rebukes from various PLO factions, such as the PFLP, and from Hamas), Abbas avoided making any similar statement when asked about the "right of return" during his Channel 2 interview. Unless Abbas and the main body of Palestinians are prepared to yield on this, their rejection of Israel as a Jewish state will remain the main impediment to a two-state solution.

At the moment, many Israeli and foreign analysts are pessimistic about the prospects for substantial progress in "proximity" talks, to say nothing of getting back to direct negotiations over final status issues discussed above. Nonetheless, in addressing tough issues pertaining to the Palestinians as well as to the Israelis, the Economist editorial represents a more even-handed approach that is generally all too lacking in media coverage of the Middle East.

NHL's Senators sponsor federation

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Ottawa is definitely a hockey town, with love for the hometown Senators crossing all demographic boundaries.

Many of the team's biggest fans and supporters are Jewish, and now the Senators are poised, in turn, to become supporters of the Ottawa Jewish community.

Ottawa Senators Sports and Entertainment has agreed to become a corporate sponsor of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa's annual fundraising campaign.

The sponsorship will involve the donation of five boxes and the "founders' box" (a large box on the fourth level that seats 75 people) at Scotiabank Place for each of two years with a monetary value of approximately $25,000.

The box will likely be used to host an event for the federation's Young Leadership division, and there will be an attempt to "monetize" the use of the boxes with some creative programming ideas, said Jack Silverstein, executive director of the federation's annual campaign.

Silverstein said the sponsorship came about as a result of a number of personal links between the two organizations.

Ian Sherman, a partner in the accounting firm Ernst & Young, is one of the team's most loyal fans and a longtime friend of Cyril Leeder, president of Senators Sports and Entertainment. They share an accounting background – Leeder obtained his CA designation at Clarkson Gordon, which is now Ernst & Young – as well as a love of hockey, and both men are also longtime, dedicated community workers.

"This is a story about relationships, and it is a story about both parties giving back to the community, which is a wonderful thing," Sherman said. "First and foremost, it's no surprise to me that the Senators Foundation would become a sponsor, because they are a first-class organization and they do so much for the Ottawa community at large."

"I've developed a very close relationship with [Leeder] over the years… and with many members of his senior executive team and management team, both within the hockey organization and the Senators Foundation," Sherman said. "When I approached Cyril, there was no question that they were prepared to do something."

Leeder lauds Sherman as one of the team's biggest fans. "He is at every event. He travels with his family to see games," he said. "There are lots of people like that in the Ottawa Jewish community… it's really our turn to reciprocate… we are happy to be involved. We are very appreciative of all the support."

Anti-Semitic graffiti found in Victoria park

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VICTORIA — The Jewish community in Victoria, B.C., was stunned to learn that vandals had spray-painted anti-Semitic graffiti on the slides and climbing apparatus in Clawthorpe Park last week.

Police estimated the vandals struck between May 10 and May 11, spraying swastikas and misspelled epithets that were speedily removed the next day by Victoria city work crews.

Det. Rhys Wickes of the Victoria Police Department asked for assistance from the public in identifying the culprits and said this kind of hate-filled vandalism is taken very seriously.

"It's just unacceptable and represents a blow to values important in Victoria," he said.

The children of Rabbi Meir Kaplan, who heads Chabad of Vancouver Island, are frequent visitors to Clawthorpe Park, particularly on Shabbat mornings.

On his blog, Rabbi Kaplan said each structure in the playground was covered with graffiti. " 'No Jews' it said on the ladder, and 'Warsaw getto' on the children's crawling space. Nazi swastikas were all over the slides. It was very uncomfortable and extremely saddening to see."

Rabbi Kaplan added that he was confident this graffiti in no way characterizes public opinion of the Jewish community on Vancouver Island.

"I know that this doesn't represent Victoria," he wrote. "We know that the general community here is friendly and tolerant. To those people who may be bothered by the stronger Jewish presence in Victoria, we have some news for them: what they have seen is just the beginning. Jewish life will flourish on the island, more people will be returning from synagogue on Shabbat afternoon... and more Jewish children who are proud of their identity will be playing in the parks."

Rabbi Kaplan said he met with Victoria Police Chief Jamie Graham on May 17 and was assured that the Victoria police were taking the case very seriously.

"Graham said they are putting their best people on the job, and that they were confident they would find those responsible," Kaplan said.

Asked if there were many members of Victoria's Jewish community who used the park regularly, he said it was primarily his family. "The reality is that we use the park regularly on Shabbat morning when we return from shul. It seems to be that this was directed against us."

This is not the first time vandals have struck the Jewish community. Just three weeks ago, the wall facing the parking lot at the Victoria Jewish Community Centre was sprayed with graffiti stating "Zionists are Nazis."

A painter primed and painted the wall, refusing to take any money for his work, and police said they would patrol the area more often. A spokesperson for the JCC said police recognized the graffiti and identified its artist as an agitator who did not target the Jewish community exclusively.

Tim Humphreys, community development officer for Jewish Federation of Victoria and Vancouver Island, said this was the second time in two years the JCC has been spray-painted with anti-Semitic slogans.

"There have been a couple of incidents of anti-Semitism up-island in the past few years, and we've called on the Canadian Jewish Congress to go and do educational sessions in the schools," he said.

"Usually once they do that, the results are very positive, because the incidents are related to a basic lack of knowledge by students."

'My life's work will continue'

He preferred to downplay the charitable arrangements at this time. "I'm not sure how it will work out," he said.

The Azrieli Foundation is registered in Canada and Israel and is headed, respectively, by Azrieli's daughters, Naomi and Danna. It currently supports a variety of projects, mainly educational, from publishing the memoirs of Canadian Holocaust survivors to helping disadvantaged Israeli kids stay in school.

Going even partially public has not been easy for Azrieli, who is proud that he has never had any partners other than his children in either the Azrieli Group or his Canadian company, Canpro Investments Ltd., which is completely separate.

"I'm getting older, my children, since the inception, are my partners. I want the transition to be smooth, without conflict in the family. They can liquidate their share, but my advice is to hold onto it," he said.

The new money will also enable the company to increase its holdings, which are starting to diversify. Last year, the group bought five per cent of Israel's largest bank, Bank Leumi, and a smaller stake in its credit card operations. It also has investments in other sectors, such as energy.

If it's a public company, there would be an assurance of professional management, he added. "I have the satisfaction of knowing that my life's work will continue and the company will be a very important factor in the economy of Israel.

"I'm very proud of our participation in the growth of the country. Now it's time for the public to have a share in this project, and hopefully they will be as proud as I am."

The disposable divorce era

A certain Rabbi was giving marital counselling in accordance with the most noble of Jewish traditions. He turned to the wife and told her that she was overly emotional, unreasonable and unfair. He then turned to the husband and said: "Do what she says". Perhaps only a married person can understand this advice.

In the era of the disposable diaper, disposable marriages have become trendy. If you don't like something, get rid of it. So, if someone irks you, get rid of her/him. When's the last time you darned your socks? Since the Divorce Act was amended in 1985, divorce is virtually automatic after one year of separation even if the income earning spouse deserts his family.

At the time, many thought these amendments would herald freedom for women chained to their husbands. Unhappy spouses could leave their relationships and remarry after one year of separation, rather than the previous three-year wait (or five years if you deserted your spouse).

Indeed, there is no doubt that the divorce rate has increased dramatically since these changes helped fashion the disposable relationship. Moreover, recent Supreme Court of Canada decisions (such as Moge) have legally confirmed that women after divorce fare far worse than men economically. Indeed, the increase in divorce rates has given us new phrases such as "the feminization of poverty". The number of poor women and children has risen dramatically across Canada since getting divorced was made easier (Sorry, I hate the word "underprivileged": euphemisms cloud reality).

Please don't misunderstand me. No one who is the victim of spousal abuse or who truly needs to be free should have to wait three years just to remarry. (Indeed, in Jewish law, there is usually no waiting period when both parties consent to a divorce). That is not the type of case to which I refer. Rather, I mourn those relationships that ended because they were "boring" and someone didn't bother trying a little harder. Changes in law affect moral behaviour, if only because the perception of moral reality changes. And the liberties we seek can create unforeseen hazards, once obtained. As Shakespeare said in Hamlet "Rich gifts wax poor when givers prove unkind".

Fortunately, many lawyers take Section 9 of the Divorce Act very seriously. A lawyer must urge a spouse to seek marriage counselling, unless the circumstances of the case are of such a nature that it would clearly not be appropriate to do so.

Physics student's research published

Toronto teen explores world of nanoparticles

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Aaron Yevick has found his talent. And it might change the world.

Sort of.

Yevick, a Toronto-born physics student at Yeshiva University, recently had his research published, for the first time, in Physical Review B, a peer-reviewed scientific journal.

While Yevick is in his second year at Yeshiva, he's only 18 years old. Last summer, when he was too young to use some of the equipment, the student worked with Anatoly Frenkel, the chair of the physics department at YU's Stern College for Women, on research about nanoparticles.

Research on nanoparticles, tiny particles made up of 10 to several thousand atoms, is of great interest to the scientific community because of their use in fuel cells, cars, electronic data storage and medicine. Much is still unknown about the properties of nanoparticles, mainly because they're too small to be accurately measured. Which is where Frenkel and Yevick come in.

Yevick and Frenkel's research focused on how to properly measure nanoparticles .

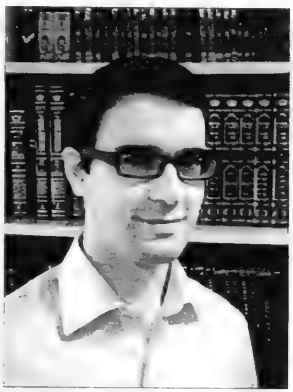
"There's this X-ray measurement technique called EXAFS, which fires X-rays at the nanoparticles," Yevick said.

The machine can estimate the size of the particles, how far apart its atoms are and the elements that its made up of. What Yevick found was that when nanoparticles are distorted or compressed, the measurements are often wrong.

"My goal was to see how well this EXAFS technology responded to surface tension... which is basically when... the clusters [of nanoparticles] are compressed for any reason, which happens in nature," he said.

Yevick did most of his research using a computer program that he wrote, which modelled nanoparticles. Using this program, he suggested a way to find the correct measurements, which could help those studying how nanoparticles can be used in areas like medicine or fuel cells.

"To be honest with you, when I did this research, I didn't think anybody would really care," Yevick said. "It got almost immediately accepted [into Physical Review B]. I don't know the scientific community much, but I know they care about this. It's going to help people measure these nanoparticles."



Aaron Yevick, a Yeshiva University student, has had his research published only 24 days after submission to the scientific journal Physical Review B.

Apart from being published only 24 days after submitting the article, in which he shared a byline with Frenkel, Yevick was one of five YU students to receive the Henry Kressel Research Scholarship, which will fund further research in his field of study. Because of the scholarship, Yevick will continue to research nanoparticles this summer.

Physics has always been a natural fit for Yevick, whose grandfather and father are both physicists.

"I never had a talent. I don't have one of those really big personalities. [I'm not] really good at English and stuff," he said.

But he is good at physics.

"With physics, you really have to know the stuff. There's no other way of solving a physics problem than to be creative and expand your mind."

The student, who spent his teen years in New York at Yeshiva University High School for Boys, credits his father for his success.

"I really owe my father a lot, a lot, a lot of credit. He's kind of always, always, always ready to help," he said. "Whenever I had a problem with class, I could always call him no matter when and he'd explain it."

Yevick hopes to become a physics professor as well, and is planning to go to graduate school for physics.

Frenkel, who will be working with Yevick again this summer, isn't surprised.

"[When working with him] I felt he was not a student, but a colleague," he said.

"I hope he will be a scientist. He's very systematic, methodical, creative, and most importantly, he's excited about his work... It's huge, his potential."

PA offers concessions on borders

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority has offered surprising concessions to Israel regarding borders for a future state, the Wall Street Journal reported on Friday.

In the framework of proximity peace talks now being mediated by the United States' special Middle East envoy George Mitchell, Palestinian negotiators have reportedly offered to match and even double the amount of West Bank land territory that Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas offered to former prime minister Ehud Olmert during their one-on-one 2008 talks.

During those talks, Abbas offered Olmert to exchange 1.9 per cent of West Bank land for an equal amount of Israeli territory. Olmert countered with a much higher demand of his own, which the current reported offer would still not come close to matching.

Palestinian officials told the Wall Street Journal that the unexpected proposal was being made due to their assumption that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was not serious about reaching a final status deal within the indirect negotiations.

Palestinian chief negotiator Saeb Erekat said his government was approaching the proximity talks in good faith and "are not going to waste Mitchell's time.

"We want Mr. Mitchell to succeed because his success is our freedom," he said.

Mitchell was in the region this week for talks with Abbas and Netanyahu. A statement from Netanyahu's office said they had discussed during their meetings the possibility of gestures toward the Palestinians. No details were given, but the gestures seemed likely connected to easing movement for Palestinians in the West Bank.

In related developments, Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman says in a classified document that despite the indirect talks with the PA, the PA is expected to conduct a diplomatic struggle against Israel abroad. Lieberman makes his case in the document handed out to the forum of seven senior ministers.

The report also states that the Palestinians will seek to use the so-called proximity talks to increase American pressure on Israel to continue the freeze on settlement construction well beyond its September deadline.

However, the document notes that if confidence in Israel's intentions is restored, direct negotiations might be possible.

The report was distributed to the ministers on May 6 and was prepared at the Foreign Ministry's Center for Political Research by the head of the Palestinian affairs team. The department, the ministry's intelligence branch, is responsible for political assessments – first and foremost on the peace process.

[Israel Sun photo]

One of the report's messages is that the main reason the Palestinians agreed to indirect talks is their wish to test the seriousness of Israel's intentions.

"The Palestinians are embarking on talks with no faith in their outcome, virtually with the expectation that they will fail," the report says.

Foreign Ministry analysts say the basic Palestinian positions on the core issues – borders, Jerusalem, security, refugees, water and settlements – haven't changed since the days of past negotiators Ehud Barak, Tzipi Livni and Ehud Olmert.

"In our assessment, the Palestinians will not reveal any area of flexibility, especially not on issues of borders and territory exchanges, because in their view the Israeli government is not genuinely interested in carrying out effective negotiations," the report says.

The document notes that the Palestinians agreed to hold the proximity talks to extend the freeze on settlement construction in the West Bank and possible also in east Jerusalem.

It says the Palestinians agreed to indirect talks because they seek good relations with Washington. In this way, they might receive U.S. guarantees and be in a good position if the Obama administration puts forth its own peace plan.

The possibility is also raised that the Palestinians will turn to the United Nations Security Council to seek backing for a Palestinian state within the 1967 borders, with east Jerusalem as its capital. They would concentrate efforts on the United States so it does not veto the initiative.

According to the report, one area where the Palestinians are flexible is the timetable of the proximity talks. They would agree to extend it beyond the four-month limit, possibly moving to covert direct talks if sufficient trust were built, the report says.

Obama, Jewish lawmakers discuss Israel, strategy

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — President Barack Obama exchanged views with Jewish members of Congress on his relations with Israel and discussed strategies on how to counter the perception that he is not pro-Israel.

"We discussed Iran, the situation in the Middle East, the efforts of the Republican Party to distort President Obama's positions on Iran and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict," Congressman Steve Rothman, a Democrat from New Jersey, said afterward.

The 90-minute meeting on May 18 at the White House drew 37 of the more than 40 Jewish members in both Houses of Congress.

"The conversation included an update on proximity talks and administration efforts to strengthen Israel's security, including the administration's recent decision to provide Israel with an additional $205 million in funding for the Iron Dome missile defence system," a White House statement said, referring to Israel's short-range missile defence program.

Also discussed was the announcement earlier the same day that the Obama administration had rallied major power support for a new set of sanctions on Iran.

Congressman Eliot Engel, a Democrat from New York, who had criticized the Obama administration for openly pressuring Israel after tensions intensified in March over Israel's settlement building, said it was a frank discussion, initiated by the White House.

"It was a very frank and good talk," he said. "The president said he'd like to continue this."

Engel called it a "mistake to publicly air grievances against Israel, while at the same time they were silent on things the Palestinians had done to undermine the peace process. We questioned why this had to happen. When allies have disagreements as they usually do, it has to be behind closed doors."

Rothman, an early backer of Obama's presidential candidacy, said the members thanked Obama for such initiatives, describing Obama as "the best president on U.S.-Israel military and intelligence co-operation in American history."

Much of the talk was about how to spread the word about Obama's assistance to Israel to counter claims by Republicans and others that Obama is not pro-Israel, Rothman said.

Engel said he couldn't blame the Republicans for seizing a natural opening.

"You can't blame the Republicans for trying to move in and take advantage of something," he said. "If there hadn't been a chastising of Israel, it wouldn't have given the Republicans an opening."

Going into November midterm elections, Engel said, "we've got to make sure that everyone knows the bond is unbreakable."

Not present at the meeting were two of Congress' three Jewish non-Democrats: Republican Congressmen Eric Cantor, from Virginia, and Bernie Sanders, from Vermont.

Attending, however, were some of Obama's toughest critics in the wake of tensions in March between Israel and the United States over settlement building: Senator Joe Lieberman, an independent from Connecticut, Senator Chuck Schumer, a Democrat from New York, and Congresswoman Shelley Berkley, a Democrat from Nevada, among them.

Berkley told the Associated Press that she emerged believing Obama is on Israel's side, but that he needs a better understanding of the nuances.

"I do want to see the president step up and vocalize his support for Israel far more than he has," Berkley told the AP in an article distributed by her office.

Jewish groups welcome Iran sanctions but want more

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — U.S. Jewish groups welcomed the announcement of the unified front by major world powers on Iran sanctions.

But they want to know the details – and they're still pressing for unilateral sanctions by the U.S. Congress.

Last week, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton told the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee that the five permanent, veto-wielding members of the UN Security Council had agreed on "strong" Iran sanctions.

The announcement came partly in response to Iran's attempt to defang international efforts to monitor its nuclear development by agreeing to a nuclear exchange with Turkey and Brazil.

"We have been working closely with our P 5+1 partners for several weeks on the draft of a new sanctions resolution on Iran," Clinton said, referring to the five Security Council members and Germany. "Today, I am pleased to announce to this committee we have reached agreement on a strong draft with the co-operation of both Russia and China."

Those two countries have been the most reluctant to expand existing UN sanctions on Iran.

The American Jewish Committee, one of the groups at the forefront of efforts to galvanize international support for multilateral sanctions against Iran, welcomed the announcement.

"Secretary Clinton's announcement is very encouraging," said David Harris, AJC's executive director. "We hope the UN Security Council will accelerate its deliberations and adopt a new resolution to significantly tighten the sanctions regime to thwart Iran's ambitions to obtain nuclear weapons capability."

Clinton did not outline the proposed sanctions, noting that the draft resolution must circulate among all 15 members of the Security Council. Reports in recent months have suggested that the sanctions under consideration would expand the list of individuals and entities already sanctioned in earlier resolutions and also target Iran's financial sector.

Canada "welcomed" the progress being made on this issue. Lawrence Cannon, minister of foreign affairs said in a statement last week, but stressed there was more work to do.

"The government of Iran must address the serious lack of confidence that members of the international community have in its nuclear program," he said. "We remain concerned about the potential military links to Iran's nuclear program, and Iran has made no attempt to comply with UN Security Council resolutions. Canada strongly supports further sanctions through the council. We will work with our allies to encourage effective responses to the threat that Iran poses to international peace and security.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, said while his organization was "glad" the international community seemed finally prepared to recognize the central role played by the Iranian Revolutionary Guard corps, "we can't help but be disappointed that these [resolutions] don't really represent the kind of sanctions that will truly coerce Iran into conforming with its international obligations with respect to their nuclear program."

He added: "There are a lot of things left out that we think would have been critical to include in any new round of sanctions, including the capacity for focus on the gas and energy sector to serve as a real mechanism for forcing that kind of compliance. However, we still remain hopeful that Canada's leadership at the G-8 and G-20 meetings will yield some more tangible and focused efforts with respecting this challenge."

The U.S. Congress is considering its own set of expanded and tougher unilateral sanctions that would target third-party entities – companies, individuals and countries that deal with Iran's energy sector.

The Obama administration is wary of the package, fearing it would drive away partners from multilateral sanctions.

The American Israel Public Affairs Committee called on the Obama administration to embrace the congressional package – likely to pass within weeks – as a complement to the multilateral sanctions.

"American and international sanctions on Iran must be overwhelming to change the dynamic within Iran and to alter the policies of Iranian leaders," AIPAC said in an analysis it distributed after Clinton's announcement. "Sanctions should target Iran's finance, insurance, shipping, transportation, natural gas and manufacturing industries in addition to Tehran's dependence on refined petroleum."

Clinton drew a direct link between her announcement and Iran's attempt this week to head off additional sanctions by agreeing to a diluted version of an earlier U.S.-initiated proposal to enrich some uranium to medical research levels in exchange for transparency. Under the agreement, Iran would export half its low-enriched uranium to Turkey and Brazil for enrichment to medical research levels.

The Obama administration has rejected the deal as inadequate. U.S. officials noted that under the original U.S. proposal, Iran would have had to relinquish its entire existing store of uranium and make its program more transparent. Under the Brazil-Turkey deal, Iran would retain enough low-enriched uranium to manufacture a single nuclear bomb should it obtain the means to further enrich it.

AIPAC called the deal a "stalling tactic."

"The Iran-Brazil-Turkey deal fails all counts," AIPAC spokesperson Josh Block said. "It leaves them with enough material to make a bomb. Iran has said it plans to continue enriching nuclear fuel, and there is no indication that Iran is even willing to talk about suspending enrichment as called for by four UN Security Council resolutions."

Clinton said the administration's announcement of an agreement on Security Council sanctions against Iran "is as convincing an answer to the efforts undertaken in Tehran over the last few days as any we could provide."

What next in Haiti?

By MICHA ODENHEIMER
ISRAEL 21c

The Petionville refugee camp, stretches across what was, before the earthquake on Jan.12, a country club for the Haitian elite.

The camp, which houses some 60,000 people, is the largest refugee camp for the earthquake victims in the country. Thousands of tents, constructed of red, yellow, blue or orange tarp, cover the rolling hills of the camp like strange plastic flowers. In the distance, you can see the sea.

People from all over Port au Prince, and from a cross section of Haitian society, are living in the camp. Some come from crowded slums not much different than the camp, while others are middle class families. All of their former lives, and often some of their closest relatives, are buried in the rubble of their former homes.

Amid the crowded, precariously steep dirt pathways in the camp, there are unexpected sights such as tents that have been converted into fledgling businesses – beauty parlours, tiny shops and bars. A tent with a sign that reads "cyber café" is probably powered by a generator, as there is no electricity in the camp. The most popular image here, appearing even on some of the business signs, is a drawing of Haiti with an eye painted on it, turning the map into a face – a large teardrop rolls down the country's cheek.

There are thousands of children in the camp, but only one school, run by volunteers from the Israeli non-profit Tevel b'Tzedek and funded by IsraAID, an umbrella organization of Israeli groups working in the developing world.

I founded Tevel b'Tzedek, which has been working with poor and marginalized communities in Nepal for the past three years through its service programs that combine volunteering with the study of poverty, Jewish social justice values and globalization.

Nine Israeli and U.S. Jewish volunteers of Tevel have been in Haiti for the past two months. As I walk through the camp with them, they seem to know everyone, from the children to the U.S. Marines providing camp security. There is an amazingly unlikely moment as we climb the steep hill toward the school – we meet a group of Nepali UN soldiers, and the Tevel Nepal graduates chat with them in Nepali. It seems like the harbinger of a new world.

Besides setting up the school in Petionville, which reaches 260 children, Tevel has put up community tents with programming for preschoolers, teenager and adults. The volunteers learned informal education techniques, such as the use of theatre, during previous stints with Tevel in Nepal, and are applying everything they learned to the even more chaotic reality of Haiti. They work using theatre and song, local talent and local translators, and teach leadership techniques ("leadership" means motivating people) as well as health and geography.

During an art class, Yonatan, one of the volunteers, tells the kids to paint what is on their minds. One of them draws a picture of people screaming against the background of a collapsed building. This is a scene etched on his memory, right after the earthquake, he says.

My job is to figure out what to do next. With the rains and then typhoons coming, the camp is not safe, especially for those on the bottom of steep hills. The camp will empty out over the next few months. Should we go to work in the next phase of semi-permanent camps? Should we move to one of the villages, where we can also use Israel's agriculture expertise to boost food production, a major priority in Haiti even before the earthquake?

J/P, an organization headed by the actor Sean Penn, is a major support for the camp. Penn himself has been here nearly continuously for the past two months. Last week, after the rains, he worked side by side with the Tevel b'Tzedek volunteers, taking instruction from Israeli army veterans about how to put up the tents.

Whatever one thinks of his radical politics, Penn is for real, working day in and day out in the hot sun, living in a tent himself. His people think we should stay with the refugee camps. "You guys are amazing," Penn tells me.

"You're the hardware, we're just a little piece of software," I answer him.

Oz wins inaugural Turin prize

Amos Oz is the first recipient of a new literary prize awarded by the International Book Fair in Turin. The Israeli author was chosen by popular vote over Paul Auster and Carlos Fuentes, the other finalists for the prize of 25,000 euros. More than 6,000 exhibitors, editors, journalists and visitors to the fair – one of Europe's most important annual literary events – took part in the vote. A record 315,000 visitors attended this year's event.

Violence in Gaza

Israeli soldiers killed two armed men on May 21 who had infiltrated Israel from Gaza. Earlier in the night, the Israeli air force struck at two arms-smuggling tunnels in retaliation for the firing on Shavuot of a Qassam rocket into the western Negev. The rocket didn't cause any damage or injuries. The last rocket attack occurred 10 days ago, when a Qassam landed near Ashkelon. Israel's military bombed two targets in Gaza in retaliation for that attack.

Chomsky barred from Israel

Noam Chomsky was to lecture to Bir Zeit University students via video conference from Amman after he was denied entry into Israel and the West Bank. Chomsky, 81, an American Jewish linguist who is a fierce critic of Israeli and American policies, was detained recently for four hours by Israeli security officials at the Allenby Bridge entry point from Jordan. The professor emeritus from MIT was scheduled to deliver a lecture at Bir Zeit University near Ramallah, in the West Bank. Sabine Hadad, a spokesperson for Israel's Interior Ministry, told the Jerusalem Post that the decision to deny Chomsky entry was a "misunderstanding." The Association for Civil Rights in Israel strongly condemned the decision to deny Chomsky entry from Jordan to the West Bank.

PA urges boycott on W. Bank goods

The Palestinian Authority has launched a boycott against products manufactured in West Bank Jewish towns. The official boycott against 500 specific products began May 19. A list of products that the PA has ordered to be boycotted will reportedly be sent to West Bank Palestinian homes in the coming weeks. Any Palestinian merchant caught dealing in the banned products faces fines and jail time. "This is an act of hostility with all intents and purposes on the part of the Palestinian Authority and its leaders, and it must be answered immediately and decisively just like any other act of hostility," the Yesha Council settlers group said in a statement last week. "This is a clear violation of the Paris Protocol which regulates the economic relations between Israel and the Palestinian Authority. Israel must use the Palestinian Authority's funds in its possession to compensate the boycotted factories."

Director determined to produce difficult plays

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Mark Schoenberg has done some acting in his time, but he will always be a director.

"It defines me," said Schoenberg, the director of Duet for One, which opens May 27.

"There's nothing like the experience of working through an extensive rehearsal with actors," he said. "The in-depth work is the work I love to do. Directors… it's like we're making worlds. We're actually building worlds."

Schoenberg, 76, worked in New York and Philadelphia before moving to Alberta, where he started Theatre 3, which is considered by some as the most influential theatre company in Western Canada. Then he left to perform in film and television.

"I don't know if it was a mistake, but it derailed me as a director," he said. "In two years, I found myself really missing theatre."

He eventually moved to Toronto, where he served as head of the professional actor training program at Humber College and continues to teach at the Armstrong Acting Studio. This is where he met Faye Lavin, who plays Stephanie, the lead character in Duet for One, written by Tom Kempinski.

The play is about a brilliant violist who is diagnosed with multiple sclerosis and, with the help of her therapist, must come to terms with the fact that she can never play again.

Back in 2008, Lavin was Schoenberg's student. "She had… very little experience, but she demonstrated astonishing qualities [for a] young actor," he said.

Schoenberg became friends with Lavin and her husband, and they decided to put on a play together.

"I knew Duet for One. Faye read the play and loved it. What's not to love?" Schoenberg said.

Mark Schoenberg directs Duet for One, the opening production of the new theatre company, STAGE Toronto.

The play was performed at at the Heliconian Club in Toronto, where Linda Heslegrave and Dan McCaughey, two theatre buffs who were in the audience, were blown away. They joined forces with Schoenberg to form a theatre company of their own, called STAGE Toronto.

For Schoenberg, this is a Toronto first.

"In Edmonton, everybody knew me and knew who I was, so my work was front and centre, whether they applauded or booed," he said. "I haven't worked very much as a professional in Toronto… This will kind of reintroduce me as a professional, for better or for worse."

Schoenberg's goal for STAGE Toronto is to produce plays that other companies stay away from, like Duet for One, which consists almost entirely of monologues.

"If we are successful, then lives will change. Faye won't be a wannabe actor anymore. She'll be sought after," he said. "It will establish our company as a company to be reckoned with… it's daunting… we're just too stupid to realize it."

Schoenberg chose to produce Duet for One because of its connection to a musical symphony.

"[It's creating] theatre as music. Or music as theatre. Each scene is like part of a violin concerto. It has its own allegro, all of the movements are mirrored by the rhythm of the scenes," he said. "[The play] goes from great joy to the abyss and back again, and it's wonderful when it works."

It's Schoenberg's job to make it work.

"Part of what I'm trying to do is make the music come alive. You change the rhythm of the scene, the intensity, you find a variety… so the audience is constantly presented with a moving landscape."

For a play like Duet for One, casting is essential. Apart from Lavin, Schoenberg cast Christopher Kelk, who is best known for his role as Rollo the janitor in the film Billy Madison, to play the therapist.

"I don't want to leave Chris out of it. He has to be a consummate listener. He has to know exactly when to poke, to prod, to initiate. And he can't just do it with the lines, he has to understand it," Schoenberg said.

As a director, Schoenberg's role is to connect with each character in the world that he's building.

"It's painful with this play. Psychologically, I have to get into the head space and heart space of the characters," he said.

Duet for One will have a special performance on May 27, in co-ordination with the MS Society, and will officially run from May 28 to June 20 at the Tarragon Theatre.

Schoenberg isn't looking forward to watching it with the audience.

"It's really tough [to watch]. It's my child. I made it. If something's wrong, it's my fault."

Israeli movies at Worldwide Short Film Festival are eclectic

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

They're the best of the best in the short film category.

This year's Worldwide Short Film Festival received 4,046 submissions, but is screening only 281.

The movies highlight the talents of filmmakers from 34 countries, including Israel and the United States.

The Israeli films are eclectic, while the American film is rooted in the Holocaust. Screenings of the films under review all take place at the Cumberland Cinema.

A Summer Rain, by Ela Thier and Jodi Midiri, is set in Connecticut in 1982 and charts the mixed emotions of a preteen Israeli girl who's been uprooted from her home by her parents' decision to immigrate to the United States.

Elisheva (Noa Rotstein), having been torn from the comfort of familiar surroundings and the embrace of friends, narrates this plaintive, 17-minute film from the vantage point of her porch.

In letters to a friend, she describes her new life, marvels at America's wealth, raves about shopping, exchanges intimacies, refers to the novelty of rain in August, reports on her progress in learning English and admits she misses Israel.

Elisheva and an Asian girl sitting on the stoop next door glance at each other furtively, but do not make contact. Can they break the ice? Can Elisheva adapt to her new homeland far from the shores of Israel?

David Broza's elegaic musical score blends perfectly with the narrative. –Sunday, June 6

Yasmine Novak's Bus focuses on the difficulties experienced by travellers – Palestinian, Israeli and foreign – as they try to cross into the Palestinian territories in the West Bank.

Given the maze of Israeli checkpoints, the journey is time-consuming, always requiring a switch to a Palestinian bus to reach one's destination.

The long delays are frustrating and even humiliating, at least in the case of a pregnant Arab woman who feels she has been mistreated by an Israeli border guard.

"It gets worse every day," says another Palestinian woman. "It's terrible."

The travel restrictions affect Israelis and foreigners, too. An Israeli woman who sets up an appointment with a Palestinian man requires elaborate directions. A French tourist is also in need of precise directions.

Bus empathizes with the inconvenience of travellers whose movements are circumscribed. But in an inexplicable lapse, it completely ignores the fact that the checkpoints, though distasteful and a symbol of occupation, are there solely for security reasons to catch suicide bombers. –Wednesday, June 2

Elisheva (Noa Rotstein) narrates A Summer Rain.

To Kill A Bumblebee, by Tal Granit and Sharon Maymon, is an eerie parable.

As two Israeli game hunters drive deeper into a forest, a bumblebee flies into their car, deftly positioning itself on the windshield.

One of the hunters kills the bee, disposing of a nuisance and a possible hazard. Their troubles, however, have just begun. One well-aimed shot at a wild animal descends into a bloody disaster. The moral of the story is that a lousy decision can lead to unintended consequences. –Saturday, June 5

Tamar Shippony's quirky In Between is a parable as well, underscoring the fragile relationship between nature and human beings.

Only two minutes long, the film unfolds on a rowboat on a placid stretch of water, as a young woman balances a tree branch in her mouth. –Wednesday, June 2

Daniela Sherer's Overnight Stay, an animated film, is narrated by an 83-year-old Holocaust survivor who recalls an awful yet illuminating incident in Krakow, Poland, in 1941 when she was a teenager.

Hunted by the Nazis, she was rescued by a gentle Pole who hid her. This act of kindness is juxtaposed against the terrible times in which she found herself.

The duality of human nature is the theme of this affecting short. –Thursday, June 3

A JEW GROWS IN BROOKLYN EXTENDED BY POPULAR DEMAND

A Jew Grows in Brooklyn, the Mirvish-imported hit comedy musical that finished an almost sold-out run in Toronto last week, has been extended by popular demand, demonstrating the power of word-of-mouth in the theatre business. The one-man show starring Jake Ehrenreich returns to Toronto for another run in June.

The show is funny, moving, warm-hearted and broad enough to appeal to everyone. You don't have to be Jewish, nor from Brooklyn, to relate to Ehrenreich's story as the child of Holocaust survivors, raised in the New York area and spending summers in the Catskills. In the second half, Ehrenreich satirizes the Catskill comedy schtick so extensively that at moments it seems indistinguishable from the real thing.

Panasonic Theatre, 651 Yonge St. June 3 to 13. Tickets $25 to $60. 416-872-1212, www.mirvish.com

CIC urges Elvis Costello to reconsider concert cancellation

Compiled by CJN Staff

The Canada-Israel Committee, through its Buycott Israel initiative, is urging British rocker Elvis Costello to reconsider his decision to cancel two scheduled performances in Israel as a political protest.

The June 30 and July 1 concerts at the Roman Amphitheater in Caesarea was to be Costello's Israeli debut with his new folk/bluegrass band the Sugarcanes.

"Please go to Elvis Costello's Facebook page and leave him a polite message asking him to reconsider," Sara Saber-Freedman of Buycott Israel said in a message to the initiative's Facebook friends. "Remind him that such artists as Paul McCartney, Elton John, Leonard Cohen, Rihanna and others have seen past the rhetoric of calls to boycott and blacklist Israel."

Costello – a prominent new wave rocker known for such early hits as Alison and What's So Funny 'Bout Peace, Love and Understanding? – discussed his decision to cancel his Caesarea concerts in a message posted on his website.

"One lives in hope that music is more than mere noise, filling up idle time, whether intending to elate or lament," Costello wrote.

"Then there are occasions when merely having your name added to a concert schedule may be interpreted as a political act that resonates more than anything that might be sung and it may be assumed that one has no mind for the suffering of the innocent."

The move came just two weeks after the musician told the Jerusalem Post that "dialogue and reconciliation" is the only solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"The people who call for a boycott of Israel own the narrow view that performing there must be about profit and endorsing the hawkish policy of the government," he told the Post. "It's like never appearing in the US because you didn't like Bush's policies or boycotting England because of Margaret Thatcher."

Explaining his decision to cancel the gigs, Costello said on his website he believed that some in his audience would "question the policies of their government on settlement and deplore conditions that visit intimidation, humiliation or much worse on Palestinian civilians in the name of national security."

He also acknowledged the Palestinians' "many despicable acts of violence perpetrated in the name of liberation."

"It has been necessary to dial out the falsehoods of propaganda, the double game and hysterical language of politics, the vanity and self-righteousness of public communiqués from cranks in order to eventually sift through my own conflicted thoughts," Costello wrote, concluding that "Sometimes a silence in music is better than adding to the static."

He called the cancellation "a matter of instinct and conscience."

Costello's Israeli promoter, Alive Productions, said it was shocked by the decision.

"In the continuous contact we've had with Costello's management, there was never even a shred of a clue that he was considering cancelling," the company said in a statement.

Prominent musicians Santana and Gil Scott-Heron have also cancelled their summer concerts due to pressure from pro-Palestinian organizations.

Costello's wife, Canadian jazz star Diana Krall, is scheduled to perform Aug. 9 at the Ra'anana Amphitheater. Alive is also promoting her show. It said it has received word from her management, which also handles Costello, that she has no plans to cancel.

Costello acknowledged in his message that he likely won't be asked again to perform in Israel, calling it "a matter of regret."

In a statement, Israeli Culture and Sport Minister Limor Livnat strongly criticized Costello. "An artist who boycotts his fans in Israel is not worthy of performing in front of them," she said.

MAKING A MESS

While Genie Award-winner Marilyn Lightstone is known for her moving performances on stage, screen and television, and as the beloved host of Nocturne – heard every evening on The New Classical 96.3FM – she also spends much of her time in her rooftop studio, working with paint and photography, producing several exhibitions a year. Located in a building that is a true workspace at Dupont and Dovercourt streets in Toronto, her 900-square-foot loft is a home away from home and the place where she gets to, as she says, "make a mess." Lightstone has two art shows coming up: the Sunnyside Beach Juried Art Show – May 28 to 30 at Sunnyside Pavilion as part of Doors Open Toronto, and the Toronto Outdoor Art Exhibition, July 9-11 at Nathan Philips Square.

Clients of Eastern Townships spa renew their spirits

Spa Life
By KATHRYN KATES

Former history and geography teacher Jocelyna Dubuc became interested in naturopathic medicine and discovered healthy cuisine, so she ventured off to India to study naturopathy, meditation and yoga. Her passions got the best of her, and by 1977, Dubuc opened Spa Eastman, a destination spa in Quebec's picturesque Eastern Townships, approximately 75 minutes from Montreal.

In addition to owning the multi-award winning destination spa, Dubuc also serves as president and general director. Spa Eastman's accommodations include a main pavilion, an eight-room pavilion and a secluded intimate house on 326 acres with 15 kilometres of trails.

Spa Eastman can administer 35 treatments per hour. There are 130 employees with 70 being therapists. The treatment rooms are decorated in warm and neutral tones with beige walls – most have windows with great views. The spa has a hair salon offering both hairstyling services and health treatments, including in-depth analysis of hair and scalp.

There's a retail space, and guests lounge in comfy robes in the large spa waiting area. Spa Eastman has a gym, two indoor pools, one is used for aqua gym classes and the other is a private pool where treatments such as Watsu are practised. Watsu is a gentle-leg massage, followed by a back massage," says Dubuc.

Other offerings are extensive and informative naturopathic consultations, personalized lifestyle and fitness programs and assessments, life coaching and individual yoga consultations. With your stay and meal package, there are a number of complimentary activities, including conferences on health and well-being, fitness classes and walks.

"We have our own product line with ingredients coming from Canada, like mud, or in our creams. Besides that, we have Decleor from France and Babor from Germany," says Dubuc.

Forty per cent of the visitors to Spa Eastman are men. Dubuc says men are comfortable at the retreat because there is no "feeling of frills," as there is at beauty institutes. Seventy per cent of the guests stay overnight and often spend a week. While others, both local and from the Montreal area, visit for the day and partake in à la carte services.

Dubuc says her mission is to make people feel good by promoting health and well-being. Spa Eastman offers local and international clients an opportunity to shape up and renew their spirits in an eco-friendly property that endorses sustainable development. The spa is committed to encouraging proper life habits and helping clients achieve overall lasting health.

"We really teach the art of living," says Dubuc, who says that Spa Eastman is the only destination spa in Quebec. "To be considered a destination spa, your cuisine must be fully healthy with no compromises. We have a fine wine cellar offering 70 per cent organic wines. Also, we have to offer a mission of education through the kinesiologist, the personal trainer and the naturopath."

Dubuc says that almost 60 per cent of their guests are repeaters. "I feel we offer a European atmosphere with a French flavour that appeals to North Americans. There are no young children, so it is a real break for parents. I want people to leave feeling good, deeply relaxed and connected to themselves and seeing life differently."

Guests often come to the retreat and never leave the property, but if you care to explore the Eastern Townships, there are a number of lakes, towns and villages, including Magog, with its many quaint boutiques, and the neighbouring village of Eastman, where the mayor, Gérard Marinovich, happens to be the Dubuc's spouse and Spa Eastman's vice-president.

To book your Spa Eastman vacation, call 450-297-3009 or 1-800-665-5272, or online at www.spa-eastman.com. For more information on the Eastern Townships online, visit www.easterntownships.org or call 1-800-355-5755.

Comic book wins Yiddish literature award

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Stingy Buzi and King Solomon, (Der karger Buzi un Shloymeh Hameylekh), a comic book in Yiddish, is this years's winner of a Canadian Jewish Book Award in the Yiddish literature and language category.

The book, with English transliteration and translation, was written and illustrated by Goldie Sigal, a former Judaica librarian at McGill University in Montreal.

It was published with the hope that it will spark an interest in Yiddish among children, and to encourage inter-generational reading, with parents or grandparents.

Stingy Buzi and King Solomon is actually an 82-page booklet with full-colour drawings on each page. The Yiddish text is in the dialogue "balloons" of the characters, and the transliteration and translation are on the same page below the strip.

"The book will be enjoyed by children from about four to 10 years old, their parents and grandparents, and anyone who wants to learn or practise Yiddish while having fun doing so," said Sigal, who published the book with the assistance of a grant from the Aaron and Sonia Fishman Foundation for Yiddish Culture.

King Solomon tries to teach a lesson to the greedy Buzi, while his court jester taunts him with food.

The story is inspired by a school play written by J.J. Grossman, a teacher at the Jewish People's School probably in the 1940s, and is based on folk tales about the biblical king.

Buzi, a greedy rich man who is nasty to his slaves and everyone else beneath him, is taught a lesson in empathy by the wise and, in this case, handsome young Solomon. A riddling Queen of Sheba plays a supporting role in the effort to reform Buzi.

Buzi is invited to the palace, not for the feast he envisions, but to be teased until he sees the error of his ways.

Yiddish alphabet and vocabulary charts are included in the book, and the dialogue is presented in the format of a play, in Yiddish only, at the end of the comic section.

The book has two "front covers," one English and one Yiddish, but the comic section is read from left to right. A supplemental nine-page workbook, Lomir itster shpiln tsuzamen (Let Us Now Play Together), by educator Batia Bettman and illustrated by Sigal, is also available.

It was Bettman who brought to Sigal's attention the surviving mimeographed copy of Grossman's manuscript.

Sigal has used the transliteration standard set by YIVO, the Institute for Jewish Research, in New York.

Sigal is grateful to her late parents, Max and Clara Kaplansky, for making "the wonderful Yiddish language part of the texture of my childhood."

She has master's degrees in English literature and library science from McGill. She edited the catalogue of A Garment Worker's Legacy: The Joe Fishstein Collection of Yiddish Poetry, published by McGill University Libraries in 1998.

Now retired from McGill, she is the curator of the website, which is both a virtual catalogue and an exhibition of highlights of the more than 2,300 Yiddish poetry books collected by the late New Yorker. The collection, donated to McGill by his family, is housed in the McLennan Library.

For more information, contact Sigal at jgsigal@videotron.ca.

The Canadian Jewish Book Awards will be presented on May 27 at the Al Green Theatre in Toronto.

Shoot for the moon, CFL commissioner tells youths

By MICHELLE BITRAN
Special to the CJN

Not many people can say they've worked for three of North America's six major sports leagues, but Mark Cohon, the commissioner of the Canadian Football League, certainly can.

A lucky group of Toronto's Jewish young adults got the opportunity to rub shoulders with Cohon when he gave a talk about his career and his life at Jewish Urban Meeting Place's (JUMP) midtown headquarters on May 13.

"All my friends call me the 'commish,' so all my Jewish friends call me the 'knish,'" Cohon said to the audience with a smile.

About 50 people packed into JUMP to hear Cohon speak. The event was part of the Jewish Employment Toronto (JET) series, aimed at Jewish professionals in their 20s and 30s. JET is a collaborative effort between JUMP and Birthright Israel Alumni Community that includes career workshops and talks by successful professionals.

"Once a month we try to feature a different type of outlet for young professionals to gain new skills in the workplace," said Debbie Osiel, JUMP's director. The JET series kicked off last November and has been a successful part of JUMP's programming since.

First-time JET-attendee Olivia Glauberzon, 26, was happy to hear Cohon's story.

"I think it's good to meet people who are in successful positions and to learn from them," she said

Cohon has worked and lived around the world, frequenting countries such as Japan, Israel and England, an experience that he encouraged everyone in the room to try given the opportunity.

Cohon said that working with professional sports leagues taught him the important lesson of "the power of sport to really give people hope and aspiration, to really get people to think about life and what they want to become."

Former captain of his high school football team and an avid sports fan his whole life, Cohon found himself a bit at odds when, following his career at the NBA, he moved back to Toronto to become president and CEO of AudienceView, a software company that allows venues, entertainment companies and teams to sell tickets online directly to their customers, without using an agent such as Ticketmaster.

Although his hard work at AudienceView earned Cohon the honour of being named one of Canada's Top 40 Under 40 in 2005, he prefers to work in a capacity that allows him to interact directly with the public, and so he decided it was time to move on.

"My father said, 'Get out if you don't love what you're doing.' That's an important lesson for everyone here," said Cohon. Cohon's father, George, is a prominent philanthropist and businessman in the Toronto community.

Throughout his talk, Cohon repeatedly recognized his family's role in pushing him forward to achieve his own success.

"We have a saying in our family called roots and wings," he said. "You give your kids the foundation to build their life upon and the wings to grow."

Cohon and his wife, Suzanne, are busy providing roots and wings for their four-year-old daughter, Parker.

Second from left is Mark Cohon and with him, from left, are JUMP staff members Aaron Glaser, Shlomo Buzaglo, Shira Webber, Debbie Osiel and Shoshana Allen. [Photo courtesy of JUMP]

Before joining the CFL as commissioner in 2007, Cohon, 44, worked as the director of corporate and game development with Major League Baseball and as vice-president of business development with the National Basketball Association.

It's now safe to say that Cohon loves his job as CFL commissioner.

"I enjoy waking up and thinking about the challenges I have with my job," he said.

Coming into the CFL at a time when it was suffering with instability and a poor media image, Cohon worked hard to turn things around. Since he become a CFL commissioner, he has seen skyrocketing television ratings for CFL games and the first Grey Cup game in Toronto in 15 years.

Outside of work, Cohon serves as chair of the Ontario Science Centre and sits on the board of the World Wildlife Fund of Canada.

Cohon also founded Youth Challenge International (YCI) in 1984, a charity devoted to global youth development. Though he no longer sits on the board of YCI, he fondly recalled his first mission with them as one of his greatest learning experiences. The mission was an expedition he led to the Canadian and Russian Arctic, allowing Canadian and Russian youth to work together on environmental and cultural projects.

"It really taught me about two things," said Cohon of his experience organizing the Arctic expedition. "Taking a risk... but also getting the right people on the bus."

Cohon's parting words urged audience members to start making career networks and to work on their interactive skills.

"You have to start young, and you have to meet those people who can get you in the right places," he said.

It was the second time audience member Josh Rosen, 22, saw Cohon speak, and he came away newly enthused. A recent University of Toronto graduate with an interest in the business side of sports, Rosen said that Cohon's speech taught him some important lessons.

"The big things are approach anybody and shoot for the moon," he said.

Spain drew close to Germany but protected Jews

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Spain was part of a small constellation of nations that hewed to a policy of neutrality during World War II. Switzerland, Sweden, Portugal and Turkey rounded out the rest of the bunch.

But was Spain, given its fascist leanings and the pro-German views of its president, Francisco Franco, really neutral? Spain, after all, tilted toward the Axis powers – Germany, Italy and Japan – and Franco collaborated with Adolf Hitler. In light of these facts and Spain's direct association with the Inquisition, was Spain sincerely committed to assisting Jewish refugees during the Holocaust?

These are intriguing questions, bold footnotes in the war, and they are thoughtfully addressed by Stanley Payne – a leading historian of modern Spain and European fascism – in Franco and Hitler: Spain, Germany and World War II (Yale University Press).

In the preface, Payne, a professor emeritus at the University of Wisconsin, acknowledges that Spain's wartime position is hardly a new topic. How could it be? Yet, as he points out, there has not yet been a study that "deals synthetically with the full range of relations between the Spanish and German regimes." In Franco and Hitler, he fills that gap quite thoroughly and admirably.

Franco and Hitler cemented their relations, such as they were, during the Spanish civil war, which broke out in 1936 and ended in 1939 with the victory of the Nationalists over the Republicans. The Nationalist forces, led by Franco – an observant Catholic who espoused traditional values – were assisted by Germany and Italy, while the Republicans were supported by the Soviet Union and foreign volunteers.

Germany and Italy, having recognized the Nationalists as Spain's legitimate government, provided Franco with invaluable political and military help. Democracies such as Britain and the United States adopted a non-interventionist stance. As the civil war wound down, Spain signed a secret friendship treaty with Germany, in which both sides agreed to be neutral in case either was involved in a war with a third party. "In the aftermath of the civil war, Spanish policy was clearly oriented toward Italy and Germany, the two powers that had made Franco's victory possible," writes Payne.

After Britain and France declared war on Germany, Spain officially announced its neutrality and called on the British and the French to negotiate with Berlin. But in a tilt to Germany, Franco informed Hitler that German submarines could be resupplied from Spanish ports and urged Italy to work for Poland's immediate surrender so as to avert an advance by the Soviet Union's Red Army into the European heartland. Interestingly, Spain rejected a French proposal for a non-aggression pact and did not condemn Germany's invasion of France, Holland and Luxemburg.

With an imperial eye on Gibraltar and Morocco, among other territories in Africa, Spain presented Germany with a shopping list of military equipment and economic assistance. In exchange, Spain would enter the war on Germany's side.

According to Payne, the Spanish regime was generally well-disposed toward participating in the war. The single most important government minister who promoted this view was Ramon Serrano Suner, who was named foreign minister in October 1940. No sooner was he appointed than he expressed "moral solidarity" with the Axis powers.

Certainly, he was not out of step with the mood in Spain: Spanish news coverage of the war was slanted toward the Axis camp. And no less a person than Luis Carrero Blanco, one of Franco's closest personal aides, characterized the war as a struggle between an "evil" Anglo-Soviet coalition "managed by the Jews" and Catholic Christianity.

Franco met Hitler, for the first and only time, shortly after Serrano Suner's appointment. Their encounter took place in Hendaye, on Spain's border with German-occupied France. Shortly after their meeting, Spain signed a protocol agreeing to "intervene" in the war on the side of the Axis side in return for a number of concessions.

Fulfilling its pledge to become a combatant, Spain contributed some 45,000 troops to the Blue Division, which, Payne says, "marked the height of Spanish collaboration with the German war effort." The Blue Division, supplied by the Germans, fought alongside Germany in the Soviet Union, Franco's ideological enemy, and sustained casualties of 4,954 dead and 8,700 wounded. (Some 800 Spanish Communists served in the Red Army). As well, Franco allowed Germany to station about 2,000 military intelligence agents and collaborators, plus a network of observation and transmission stations, in Spain. He also permitted German ships to transport supplies under cover of the Spanish flag and continued to export tungsten – a strategic metal used in the production of airplane engines and propellers – to Germany.

Beyond helping Germany, Spain lent its assistance to Japan. After Japanese aircraft attacked Pearl Harbor and the United States declared war on Japan, Spain sent Spanish agents to the U.S. mainland to supply intelligence data to Tokyo.

German diplomats in Madrid noted with dismay that Spain had enacted no anti-Semitic legislation. By 1939, several thousand Jews – Ashkenazim and Sephardim – resided in Spain. In fact, Jews began to return to Spain even before the 15th century edict of expulsion was annulled in 1869.

Still, as Payne observes, the image of Jews in Spain remained negative, partly because 6,000 to 8,000 Jews from abroad fought for the Republicans, while only a handful volunteered to fight for Franco.

Franco, whose ancestors may have been Jewish, shared some anti-Jewish notions about Jews. But in Payne's judgment, he was not a racist and maintained friendships with several Moroccan Jews.

He adds that while the official Spanish newsweekly Mundo carried regurgitated Nazi anti-Semitic propaganda, the Spanish-tinged culture of Sephardi Jews in Morocco and the Balkans was praised. Mundo was thus "philosophically anti-Semitic and concretely philo-Sephardic," Payne observes.

Officially, Spain could hardly be described as pro-Jewish. Several months before World War II erupted, the Spanish government issued a decree denying entry visas to five categories of undesirables, including those "of a markedly Jewish character" and Jews in general unless they had demonstrated tangible friendship toward Spain.

Spanish Jews, however, were not affected by this draconian edict.

During the war, the Spanish foreign ministry issued a paper saying that "Spain could not tolerate the persecution of its Jews by foreign powers." Acting on this impulse, Spain provided protective passports for Sephardi Jews in Romania, France and Bulgaria, all under the heel of the Nazis. In addition, Spain accepted the repatriation of Spanish Jews from Greece, but only for transit purposes.

Spanish diplomats in Nazi-occupied Hungary were involved in rescue efforts, saving a few thousand Jews, and some 5,000 Jewish refugees crossed into Spain to reach safe haven in Portugal.

With the war going badly for Germany, Spain granted transit and economic rights to the Allies and distanced itself from Berlin.

After the war, 255 second-tier Nazis found refuge in Spain, but some were extradited at the request of the Allies.

Spain, having cozied up to Germany and Italy during the war, was treated like something of a pariah after the Axis powers surrendered. But once the Cold War started, Franco was given more than ample breathing space to consolidate his regime.

Group aims to help cope with bladder cancer

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

When David Guttman was diagnosed with bladder cancer 16 years ago, he didn't know where to find someone else who really understood what he was going through.

"I didn't know how long I would last," he said. "You feel your life is going to be snuffed out."

He couldn't find anyone anywhere to help him or answer his questions, he said.

Instead, he had to rely on information from other people who had not personally experienced the disease, he said. However, he didn't want other people to have to face the same situation.

The result was the formation of the Canadian Bladder Cancer Network (CBCAN), a patient support network that he co-founded with fellow bladder cancer survivor Jack Moon.

The goal is to help other people who are just beginning their fight, and to tell others about the symptoms, Guttman said.

"Most patients go for six months without any treatment plan," he said, adding that he had cancer for eight months before he was diagnosed.

He said there is not enough research into the causes and symptoms of bladder cancer.

The Canadian Cancer Society describes smoking as the most common risk factor for bladder cancer. The most common symptom is blood in the urine.

In 2009, about 6,900 Canadians were diagnosed with this form of cancer, and an estimated 1,850 patients died of it, according to the Canadian Cancer Society's website.

Men are much more likely to contract the disease than women, the website says. They also have a much higher mortality rate. One in 95 men and one in 230 women are likely to die from this form of cancer.

Guttman called it the most expensive cancer to treat, explaining that even though he was diagnosed more than 15 years ago, he still requires expensive medical treatment.

Moon agreed. "Once you get bladder cancer, you basically have to have checkups for the rest of your life," he said.

Mendy Sharf, who was diagnosed with the disease just under a year ago, said it was extremely beneficial to be able to speak to Guttman for advice on coping with the surgery.

Guttman's main message, Sharf said, was "life goes on."

Sharf, who is turning 80 in a few weeks, said he still lives a normal life. He is able to play tennis with a brace to hold the bag in place, and even has a "lady friend."

The biggest challenge so far in starting the organization has been fundraising, Moon said, explaining that although this form of cancer is the fifth most common form, it is number 19 in terms of research.

However, he said some organizations have recently offered their support, including pharmaceutical giant Pfizer Canada, which recently gave CBCAN a grant.

The company already supports patient groups for kidney cancer, and bladder cancer is similar in that there is a lack of patient groups in Canada, said Safia Genereux-Khalil, manager of corporate communications for Pfizer Canada.

"We are hoping that this small contribution will help the Canadian Bladder Cancer Network get off the ground and kick-start its efforts toward helping patients," she said.

Although CBCAN has not started to hold meetings, the group runs a discussion forum where people ask questions and help each other, letting them know what they can expect as the disease progresses.

The goal of the forum, Guttman said, is to discuss the various treatment options, as well as to provide places for patients to get help with both the social and the nursing aspects of care.

The next step is to increase membership, he said, adding that volunteers are needed in administration, fundraising, and database and website maintenance, so that they can continue to help the largest number of people.

"I'm not trying to get into the medical aspect of this [disease]," Guttman said. "I'm there to help people cope with it."

For more information, please call 416-571-0016 or e-mail Guttman at davidg@cbcan.org.

Gluten-free baked goods now kosher

Compiled by CJN Staff

What would you do if you could no longer eat bread, bagels, cookies or any of the other wheat-based foods you take for granted?

This was the challenge faced by Pat Libling when she was diagnosed with celiac disease (gluten intolerance) in 1987.

"My first reaction," Libling said, "was, 'There's nothing to eat,' especially after trying many of the gluten-free products available."

When two of her daughters were also diagnosed with the condition, the former school teacher decided it was time to take matters into her own hands.

Begun as a home-based business in 2001 in Libling's Dollard des Ormeaux kitchen, the PatsyPie bakery has long since moved into a larger, gluten-free facility, occupying 3,000 square feet in Montreal.

Not only has it become one of the fastest growing gluten-free brands in Canada, available in both supermarket chains and independent stores, this innovative line has expanded into the U.S. market as well over the past two years.

PatsyPie has now been certified kosher by EarthKosher, a Teaneck, N.J.-based organization, headed by rabbis Zecharyah Tvzi Goldman and Zushe Blech, that specializes in natural and organic foods.

Current offerings include cookies, biscotti, mini-brownies and mini-muffins, whose basis is rice, corn or chick pea flours that, Libling said, all have a paper trail assuring that they were produced on a gluten-free line.

In fact, no wheat is even permitted on the bakery's premises. "If an employee wants to bring a sandwich," Libling said, "we supply the gluten-free bread."

The downfall of many gluten-free baked goods is obvious, she said – the taste and the texture. "My goal was to create baked treats that were every bit as good as or better than regular bakery items – snacks the whole family could enjoy, whether or not they needed to be on gluten-free diets."

L'CHAIM GROUP HOME FOR SENIORS
A dignified middle ground between the independence of a retirement home & the dependence of a nursing home

"I found a new and caring home. The personal care of the management and staff is beyond description."
Sophie Bendel
Retirement homes aren't for everyone. Neither are nursing homes. L'chaim occupies a unique middle ground — a perfect fit for seniors who require special attention for physical and cognitive impairments BUT who also want to retain their sense of independence and dignity. Our assisted living programs and caring staff allow them to do just that. We invite you to discover all L'chaim has to offer.

Arrogance can be both boon and bane to athletes

By JERROLD KESSEL
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Try to fathom the mystery or the import of this or that sporting incident and two maxims are particularly useful: "Promise less and deliver more, or promise more and deliver less" and "Beware Hubris" – the god of arrogance and overweening confidence whom the ancient Greeks not so much worshipped but advised avoiding at all costs – he's the guy who, just when you are basking in your latest great achievement, lies in wait around the corner to club you back to earth.

In no particular order, some recent sporting episodes to challenge the relevance of the maxims.

• Topping the list, both promising little and delivering more while successfully side-stepping Hubris' club, is surely "Uncle Avram" Grant, as the Israeli coach came to be known at unhappy Portsmouth, the soccer team that plays in the English Premiership. True, Portsmouth had luck on their side but they rode it brilliantly, and but for a squandered penalty, they could well have delivered the FA shock of all times. There's nothing the British respect more than a plucky loser, so even in defeat to Chelsea, when Grant, who resigned last week as Portsmouth's manager, continued to deport himself with great dignity and poise, he continued to earn their love.

• Shahar Peer can definitely not be accused of any kind of hubris, which can't always be said of the two women who repeatedly get in her way for the greater glory to which she's been entitled this season – tennis' Williams sisters. Now back in the top 20, Peer has done wonders in striking a balance between the promising and delivering poles. She deserves plaudits for her hard work both on court and in her head, an effort that has given her intelligent game much more chance of success. She may not able to beat either Venus or Serena, but she's surely now good enough to benefit when they're in the mood to beat themselves. Not to kid ourselves, however, that she'll ever beat Justine Henin. But then, knowing one's limits is an essential ingredient when reaching for the stars.

• Saul Bellow, once here on an extended visit to get a grip on the Israeli psyche, understood things in his usual sparkling fashion: Israelis, he said, are so ambitious that they "want to be able to boast that they have a world champion, or at least one of the best, in every single aspect of life." Who are we then to challenge the idea that the fulfilment of the Zionist dream requires a woman boxer taking the world bantamweight title? What was captivating, though, about our home-grown world's best pugilist, Hagar Finer, was less the power of her punch and more her wisdom in adversity. She grew up as an abused child and now sports a philosophy that "it's a crime if you don't fulfil your potential. Never mind the pain. The body can stand an awful lot. Go for your dream until you reach it – anything short and you should regard yourself as a failure. Failing is simply not on, as far as I'm concerned," she said in a TV interview shortly before dropping her Latvian challenger Agnese Boza recently with a fifth-round TKO.

• There were more questions than answers following the Players Championships when Tiger Woods withdrew mid-round for the first time ever in his professional career. This was going to be a week of quiet rehabilitation for the world No.1. He'd said at the start of the event that he was 100 per cent fit, so everyone was left bemused when he spoke of a "longstanding injury," which he'd denied only three days earlier. Some players naturally like to keep fitness problems to themselves, but Tiger can't afford that luxury. His fall from grace has made him vulnerable as a truth-teller. He just can't afford to be caught straying from the truth on any subject. Now Tiger has simply created for himself another unwanted controversy. Hubris' bunch of elves are clearly hard at work on his case.

• Disgraced U.S. sprinter Marion Jones is back, but with less than a whimper. Jones, 34, once the darling of track-and-field, won three Olympic titles in 2000, and five medals overall, but was later stripped of her medals after admitting she used performance-enhancing drugs. Now, after a six-month prison sentence on top of that, having played college basketball a decade ago, she's looking to get back into the limelight with the Tulsa Shock of the WNBA. In her opening game, however, she finished with no points, rebounds or assists in only four minutes of play. What's more, Tulsa lost. Despite her low-key return to competitive sport, Jones remained positive about her new career. "Thrilled doesn't even touch the surface of how I'm feeling. It's just gratifying to know I made the right decision to attempt this."

• I did say these examples were in no particular order, but for heartening sports stories anywhere, nothing tops the scene on the jetty by the Sydney Opera House. Australian Prime Minister Kevin Rudd was among the thousands welcoming Jessica Watson in her yacht Ella's Pink Lady after her seven-month voyage around the world. That was a record time, and all before her 17th birthday. "Jess, welcome back to dry land," Rudd said. "You may feel a little wobbly on your feet, but in the eyes of all Australians you stand tall – you are a hero to all young Australians, a hero to all young Australian women." Jessica's response was what garlands her: "I must disagree with our prime minister," she told the cheering crowd, "I'm no hero, just a girl who had a dream, and was determined to fulfil it. That's my advice, don't be afraid of trying to fulfil your dream."

Promise only yourself and you've half beaten old hubris bent on revenge! A message that endears even if we can't all live our dreams, though we certainly can, like Jessica, cock a snook at authorities who refuse to recognize her historic effort as a record simply because she's been labelled "too young."

FEEL THE HEAT: Thousands of runners took part recently in the Tel Aviv Marathon, with seven ending up in the hospital. The marathon, held for the second year running after a break of 15 years, was run in blistering heat. More than 400 participated in the full marathon, with others running the half-marathon, 10-k and 4.2-k races.

'She's so young and so generous'

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

After spending months preparing for their bar or bat mitzvahs, children are often rewarded with gifts in the form of money.

Allie Fenwick, who celebrated her bat mitzvah last Nov. 21, chose to use a a portion of her gift money to give less fortunate children the means of experiencing Jewish summer camp.

Her mother, Gail, said she suggested to her daughter that some of the gift money be donated to charity.

Allie, who is returning for her fifth year at Camp Kadimah in Nova Scotia, said she felt a strong connection to the camp and wanted other children to experience the same fun.

"The people there are really nice, and they have so many fun activities during the summer," she said, adding that she particularly loves the water sports, such as wakeboarding, at the camp.

Her parents, grandparents and siblings all attended Camp Kadimah, she said.

Allie said she's excited about the donation because she will get to meet new people who might not otherwise be able to afford to go to the camp.

Camp Kadimah co-chair Michael Pink said that each year, the camp gives out more than $100,000 in scholarships that range in value. Allie's donation, he said, will help around five to 10 children attend the camp.

Camp director Diane Morrison said she had heard that a camper was making a donation, but that she didn't expect it to be such a significant amount.

"She's so young and so generous," Morrison said.

Since the camp introduced this form of tzedakah three or four summers ago, typically one or two families per year choose to support the camp in this manner, Pink said.

Fenwick's donation is the first of its kind for this year, he added.

Kadimah means a lot to many of the camp's alumni, and they have made this significance quite clear through their generosity, Morrison said.

The camp aims to help create a love of Israel among campers and staff, according to its website.

This year, to strengthen the campers' connection to Israel, the camp is bringing in 25 to 30 Israelis to experience the camp. Most of them are from the Sderot region, Pink said.

"[Allie's] gift will go a long way to help in this initiative."

The camp is located near Barss Corner, N.S., on Lake William, and has existed since 1943.

It's affiliated with Canadian Young Judaea, the largest Jewish youth movement in Canada.

The donation is especially important because it allows Allie to become an excellent role model for her fellow campers, said Pink.

"What better example are these kids able to set for their peers than to provide great experiences for kids who would not otherwise be able to afford to go to summer camp?"

CARROT AND CRANBERRY SALAD WITH FRESH GINGER DRESSING

7 lg green onions
1/2 c seasoned rice vinegar
2 tbls chopped peeled fresh ginger
4 c coarsely grated peeled carrots
1/2 c sweetened dried cranberries

Cut tops off onions; cut lengthwise into thin strips, then 2" pieces. Chop half of onion bottoms. Place remaining bottoms in blender; add vinegar and ginger. Puree, occasionally scraping down sides of blender bowl. Strain, puree into measuring cup, pressing enough solids through to yield 1/2 c dressing; season with pepper. Place carrots and cranberries in large bowl. Add onion tops and bottoms. Toss with enough dressing to coat.

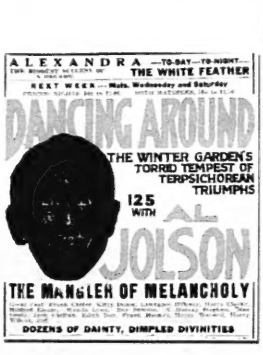
REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE



JOLSON AT THE ROYAL ALEX: Al Jolson (born Asa Joel) is regarded as the first openly Jewish man to become an entertainment star in America. He appeared in his first play at the Winter Garden Theatre in New York City in 1911, and his exuberant energy and singing style made him an instant sensation. He had many sell-out Broadway shows, dozens of hit records and many international tours. These advertisements promote two of his appearances at Toronto's Royal Alexandra Theatre in 1915 and 1920.

Does bar/bat mitzvah mean anything?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

A bar or bat mitzvah is a Jewish rite of passage, as significant as any other on the planet. It is a turning point when a child leaves the magical years of play and life morphs into a more sophisticated time of deeper thought and responsibility.

A bar or bat mitzvah is huge, of utmost importance. Yet, as per my experience, many youths going through this ceremony are not being taught well, don't take it seriously and express little interest in it.

Of course, there are those I meet who are excited and want to know as much as they can about this rite of passage. Generally, these are girls and boys who can learn from anyone or anything.

Then there are the others who don't know the meaning of their Torah portion or the story behind it, and in fact approach this day in a laissez faire sort of way.

Few bar or bat mitzvah celebrants have any idea about the Jewish meaning of this rite of passage, what a tallit represents, or tfillin, let alone trying them on or wearing them prior to the big day and/or afterwards.

The problem lies, I believe, in the commitment to the day. It appears to me that parents of the celebrants are often disinterested themselves and decide to have a party because it's expected. I have heard many times that dad or mom did not work with their daughter or son at all during the studying process

The bar or bat mitzah teachers often teach very little to the youths other than the few lines they need to read in the Torah.

Of course, there are wonderful teachers who care deeply about their craft and work closely with the bar or bat mitzvah celebrant as well as his or her parents. These teachers are often extraordinary and work hard to ensure that their students have a "beyond the call" understanding of the Torah portion and the day itself.

On average however, I fear this is not the case, and students are generally offered a minimal amount of information.

I think it's imperative that shuls, teachers and parents dive into this process with gusto. They could consider going through it with their children so that they, too, know the portion, have read it and embraced it.

I think teachers need to start by putting down the books and just talking for a few hours with their students about the wonderment of the day and what it means to pass from one stage to the next.

One of the problems is that the party has become more important than the bar or bat mitzvah itself – when the youth is called to the Torah and/or asked to stand in front of the congregation and express a Jewish thought. The celebration has become like a theme park, where the visitor can sing with Mick Jagger or party with some rappers. While there is nothing wrong with hanging with Mick, I'm sure, there is much more to this day and time than rock 'n' roll.

An obvious way to enhance young people's delight in their bar or bat mitzvah is by recording songs and the Torah portion for iPod use. A bar mitzvah student I was told about did exactly that, and it was quite exciting.

E-mail me at avrum@veahavta.org with ideas if you are a teacher, shul leader or parent of a bar or bat mitzvah student, and I will post them on my blog – http://avrum.net.
